Scotia Oil and Gas Agreement Bill; Bill C-47, the Indian Act Amendment Bill, and the legislation for CORE, which I believe has not yet been tabled, since I do not have a number for that bill. From the inquiries I have made, honourable senators, the estimate is that we may receive anywhere from five to twelve bills for consideration next week. That is being rather optimistic.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That is no problem for us.

Senator Frith: However, I am simply passing on information I have received. I am not taking it as a brief, neither am I supporting it or not supporting it.

So the prospect for next week, honourable senators, is that if things go as expected we will sit on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, when, if leave is granted, we will have the speech moving second reading of Bill C-9. We will then continue with the debate on Bill C-9 if the opposition is ready to proceed. That may not be the case, of course, because Senator Nurgitz may be unable to attend that evening.

If we should decide towards the adjournment time on Monday evening that it would be profitable to sit on Tuesday morning because of the possibility of referring the bill to committee—because that is the intention—then that might be the course we will follow.

As honourable senators recall, the Honourable Senator Pitfield chaired a special Senate committee that conducted a thorough study of a previous bill relating to that legislation, so there is a starting point. That committee spent all of last summer studying that legislation, and the current bill takes into account many of the Senate's recommendations. For that reason it is expected that the committee study will not be as lengthy as it otherwise might be.

We will then proceed with such other bills as we shall have received from the other place. We will then attempt to have Royal Assent on Thursday. Where it is appropriate, and where we can profit by doing so, we will sit mornings, afternoons and evenings, but it may be that that will not be necessary, certainly not every day.

So, honourable senators, that is the program for next week and that is why I am moving that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, hope springs eternal as far as the government's expectation of getting its legislation through is concerned. I noticed that last week Senator Langlois was quite sure that we would receive legislation today, and now Senator Frith assures us that Bill C-9 will be passed tomorrow. It may be that we will not receive that legislation until Friday, but in any event I wish to confirm what I have already told him; that is, that as far as we are concerned any bill that comes to the Senate from the other place on Monday, we agree to commence debate on the motion for second reading on Monday evening. I assume that that will cover Bill C-9 and perhaps a few other bills, but the other bills will certainly not be contentious if they are passed by the House of Commons on Friday. We have no problem with that. We will see what will come next week.

Senator Frith also mentioned that Royal Assent may take place on Thursday next, and that is fine with us if we can operate within the time frame that we more or less expect. However, I do not think it follows that we can dispose of some of the bills Senator Frith mentioned in just an hour or two if they come before the Senate on Thursday. I am thinking of the Labour Code bill and the bill to establish the peace institute, which is simply a monument to the outgoing Prime Minister. We may have some objection to dealing with them so quickly. There are, of course, other bills that we shall be only too happy to support. Under the circumstances, we consider that the adjournment of the Senate until Monday next is the only practical solution.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I understand that Senate committees have been scheduled to meet tomorrow morning and afternoon. Will those committees still meet?

Senator Frith: Yes. There is no reason why those committees should not meet.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THEATRE BALLET OF CANADA

FUND RAISING

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators probably know that yesterday evening a boat race was held in Ottawa to raise money for local charities. Reports are circulating in Ottawa that questionable tactics were used by the Deputy Leader of the Government, the skipper of the victorious boat, in order to win the race. Is the Deputy Leader of the Government prepared to confess to that?

Some Hon. Senators: Liberal tactics!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: A surprising upset!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday evening I had the honour to compete against the Honourable George Hees, P.C. in a boat race, and, of course, anyone who read the sports pages of this morning's press could agree with Senator Nurgitz that our crew's win was a surprising upset. If "Admiral" Hees raised any questions about the race, then he did so after the period when such questions could have been received, because he did not complain at the time but very gallantly extended his congratulations to me and my crew. If, in fact, anything that I did could have given rise to any questions, it could only have been the result of rather severe provocation on the part of "Admiral" Hees.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I understand that next year Mr. Hees is challenging the Deputy Leader of the Government to a talkathon, and in that connection he will surely lose.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Will he report to the Senate before the session ends concerning the federal government's sports pool lottery? On May 30 he undertook to provide us with the figures of sales to that date so that Canadians can be told whether or not the report now being circulated of a loss amounting to $750,000 per week is true.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the exact page in Hansard, but I would refer the honourable senator to Hansard of a few days ago when, in reply to a supplementary question, I indicated that the statistics asked for were not compiled on a weekly basis but would be on a monthly basis. I will provide those figures as soon as they are available.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary.

Will the federal government, now that the federal lottery is losing $750,000 weekly, take the advice of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and review the situation in six months? Does the federal government intend to lose $750,000 of taxpayers' money on a federal lottery that is poorly organized and is not operating properly? Why not get rid of this lottery system at once instead of wasting huge amounts of taxpayers' money?

[English]

Senator Olson: The federal government wants the sports pool to be successful as quickly as possible, in order to support financially all of those worthy causes that are involved in amateur sport, medical research and other useful and laudable enterprises.

Senator Asselin: But you are losing money.

Senator Olson: Any and all action that can appropriately be taken to make the sports pool profitable, to provide a larger amount of financial support for those enterprises, will be taken by the government.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is it true that the federal government, notwithstanding the enormous losses suffered by the federal lottery and without further review, is prepared to invest another $20 million of taxpayers' money in an organization that is literally a non-profit operation?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe I answered the honourable senator's question—

Senator Asselin: You did not.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should listen very carefully to what I am saying. I will repeat for his benefit that the federal government is anxious that financial support should come from the sports pool as soon as possible to support those worthy causes that have been designated as beneficiaries.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Leader of the Government be in a position to give honourable senators a reply before the end of next week? I ask that for two reasons. The first is that the session may end next Friday. Also the minister, at that time, may be nothing more than a lame duck minister.

Senator Asselin: The three of them.

Senator Frith: Lame ducks, not dead ducks!

Senator Flynn: I am wondering if the position of the three ministers is to avoid giving a reply in case eventually a new Cabinet is sworn in, with new faces to try to convince Canadians that we have something new by way of a government?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, quite frankly, I cannot see that all of the rhetoric has added very much to the question, from the viewpoint of either intelligence or background. The rhetoric was unfounded and based on imagination, which is typical of the opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: What was unfounded?

Senator Olson: There was very little substance to the question. However, the honourable senator asked whether or not a reply could be given by, I assume, June 30, which is the date of the proposed adjournment. If he looks at the reply that I recommended Senator Nurgitz read, he will see that I believe we will have a reply by that date, although I am not absolutely certain. I know that there will be a compilation done to that date, but whether it can be made available and presented to this chamber by that date, I am not quite sure.

Senator Asselin: Is the Leader of the Government ready to consult with his new leader on this matter, to learn whether he agrees with the decision taken by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport?

Senator Olson: That is the kind of question that really discredits the opposition, because the honourable senator knows very well that there is a government now in office, with a Prime Minister, and that is where the answers for the operation of government will emanate from until the date of transition. After that date there will be a new Prime Minister, who will take the responsibility for what happens thereafter.

ADDITIONAL GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL SUPPORT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is searching for some of the answers, hopefully to be brought to the Senate some time next week, can he also confirm that the government is proposing to inject a further $20 million of taxpayers' money into this venture; and, if not, can he say what amount of money will be injected to keep this project alive?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senators Nurgitz, Flynn and Asselin and others know that when a business is started it takes a few days to have all of the machinery operative on a profitable basis. There is nothing new about that—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Friends of your party were hired.

Senator Olson: —and if honourable senators opposite do not understand, then they know absolutely nothing about business. What I said a few minutes ago is that the government is anxious to have it profitable as soon as possible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That would mean that you still have hopes.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn answered that question himself when he said a while ago that hope springs eternal in the Liberal Party, and with good reason.

Senator Flynn: We shall compare the hopes to the results.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSION ACT—ADJUDICATION PROCESS

● (1430)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has appointed Judge Marin to look into the adjudication process of the Pension Act. First, I wonder if the minister would tell us whether this matter comes under the cabinet committee which he heads.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I was not party to the discussions held prior to the selection of Judge Marin. That is a matter which comes under the responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and it is not part of the cabinet committee process.

Senator Marshall: I have no objection to the appointment of Judge Marin. However, I wonder whether the minister could get from the Minister of Veterans Affairs a statement as to the background and reasons for the the appointment of Judge Marin. Does this new study follow the previous study done by Mr. Art McCracken on the reasons for the backlog of pension applications, a backlog which is reaching very trying proportions? The whole thing is a wonder to me because it has been known for the past two or three years that there is a backlog. I would like to know why they finally decided, at this late date, to look into the adjudication process, which has denied many veterans the right to a pension because of the ambiguity in the legislation.

Senator Austin: I shall take the question as notice.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION*MARKET STUDIES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I return, by way of a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to the matter of the lottery. Some weeks ago I saw remarks attributed to officials of the Government of Quebec to the effect that they were not worried about competition from the federal lottery because they had done market studies on the possible effectiveness or sales potential of the kind of sports pool which the federal government is now sponsoring, and their studies had led them to the conclusion that that kind of sports pool would not fly.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It doesn't even float.

Senator Murray: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can assure us that the federal government did adequate market studies in advance, that those market studies were such as to convince the federal government that this type of sports pool would be a success, and that the minister will let the Senate and the public see copies of those market studies, in the spirit of freedom of information.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think that the sports pool needs to float or fly because it would indicate that it is going to be on water or up in the air.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: It will just sink!

Senator Olson: It is firmly on the ground and being run by the most competent people the federal government can obtain to do this job, people who have a record of success in this kind of marketing. I know that over the years there have been a number of productions on the desirability of an available market for this type of operation, but whether or not any figures can be produced, I do not know. In any event, I suppose it is a matter of opinion.

Senator Murray: It is not.

Senator Olson: Yes, it is. Senator Murray knows that, but he is pursuing this matter for other reasons, which we understand very well. I shall make some inquiries to see if there are some replies. However, that does not mean that we accept the validity of the criticism from other market surveys because, as Senator Murray knows, the Government of Quebec has a vested interest, which they have stated publicly, in seeing that this sports pool fails, and we are determined that it is not going to fail.

Senator Murray: I do not think it is very gracious for the minister, during his final days in Cabinet, to attribute motives to other senators.

Senator Olson: I can do it every day, if you like.

Senator Murray: If the minister can not lay on the table, for whatever reasons, the market studies on which the federal government decision was based, I would like to have his assurance that the results of the market studies were such as to persuade the government that this type of sports pool would be a success. I would like him to identify, for the benefit of the Senate and the public of Canada, the names of the persons or companies who conducted those market studies on behalf of the federal government.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have taken these questions as notice very—

Senator Murray: Reluctantly.

Senator Olson: I was going to say "religiously."

Senator Flynn: You are piling them up for after the election.

Senator Olson: I obtain accurate, adequate and complete replies, but Senator Murray, in this case, is putting forward an almost impossible request because he is asking me to produce figures that would satisfy him that the judgment of the government in this matter was good. That is nearly impossible, so why attempt to undertake what is obviously an impossible task? Senator Murray will not acknowledge that the government made the right decision, no matter what we lay on the table.

Senator Murray: Of course, ultimately, I will want to see the studies and the figures and, ultimately, I will have them. Of course, they will be published in the spirit of freedom of information. In the meantime, I want the minister to produce, first, the assurance that the government has such studies and that they confirm that such a pool would be a success; and, second, I want him to identify the names of the persons who or companies which conducted such studies on behalf of the government. That is not the kind of information that is apt to prejudice whatever competitive position the pool may have or aspire to.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should have got around to his question some time ago because, as you know, with my usual accommodating nature, I shall take the question as notice.

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, 1988—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): While the minister is digging into that grave, would he tell us whether—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): If that is what it is, I don't want to dig in it.

Senator Flynn: —any money has been paid to the Calgary Olympic Games up to now and, if so, whether any has come from the sports pool?

Senator Olson: It ought to be obvious to the Leader of the Opposition that the sports pool has yet to reach the point of maturity where it is showing a great profit.

Senator Flynn: I will take that as an answer.

Senator Olson: Some advances have been made to the Olympic Games in Calgary, but that is a matter of public information.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government—and I am sure that he can answer it well—whether or not that distinguished journalist, Douglas Fisher, is right in his predictions. Considering that the export of Irish moss from Prince Edward Island is a very important element in the commerce of Canada; considering that that industry is in serious difficulty at the present time; and considering further that the fisheries was a very important element in the comprehensive economic plan signed last week by representatives of the government of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion of Canada, can the minister say whether the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans has been asked to be helpful in any way in ameliorating the problems now facing the Irish moss industry? I invite the minister to take this as notice and to give us one of his carefully researched answers, about which he has told us this afternoon and, perhaps, to take what could possibly be his last opportunity to tell us how good he is.

● (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with great effort I will resist that last temptation.

It seems to me that I had an answer to that question. I carried that answer with me for weeks in order to respond to Senator Macquarrie, since he has made this type of inquiry before. Unfortunately, I do not have the answer with me today. Thus, I will take as notice his question with respect to the Irish moss industry.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Watt).

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators—

[Senator Olson.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I have the duty to inform the Senate that if Senator Watt speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some comments I wish to place on the record with respect to this matter. We will not oppose Senator Watt's motion except to say "On division". We say this because of the objections we have with respect to the multiplication of committees; that is, the creation of special committees, this being one, while our numbers remain so small. This problem is not soon to be remedied if the rumours are true that the outgoing Prime Minister plans to fill all vacancies in the Senate with supporters of the Liberal Party.

In any event, if it is the will of the majority to pass this motion, if it is their will to impose Liberal numerical supremacy on this house for the next 20 years, then so be it. But we hope to God that the next election produces a government of another colour. We hope that God will inspire the people of Canada in that respect.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I realize that we do not have much time to perform any substantial work at the committee level before we adjourn for the summer; however, I would like to put my motion to a vote.

Motion agreed to, on division.

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, which was presented earlier this day.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, essentially, the report which I have presented today and which you have before you is a review of the public and governmental response to the 21 recommendations contained in a report by the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline respecting the transportation of natural gas north of 60°, tabled in this chamber on March 30, 1983.

In its report, the special committee identified certain concerns and issues it felt had to be addressed if northern hydrocarbon development and transportation were to develop in an orderly manner for the benefit of all Canadians. The special committee also indicated that if Arctic development were to proceed with any degree of excellence then it would take the co-operation of all concerned, that is, governments, industry, regulators, the people of the north and interested organizations, and that a continuing, meaningful dialogue had to be maintained between the players—indeed, that it was essential. Hence, the title of the report "Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum".

The special committee addressed some of the potential impediments it felt needed to be reduced if effective co-ordination were to be attained and if we were to upgrade our capacity to prepare for continued development, assuring maximum benefits and control of negative impact on the north and northern people. In its report, the committee expressed irrevocably and totally its commitment to the concept of participation in northern development by northerners. While the north and the Arctic will be developed for the benefit of all Canadians, it was the feeling of the committee that it should be northerners who benefit in the evolving policies of the north and, more importantly, it is they who should benefit completely from the economic benefits which may accrue.

In seeking the response of the public and the government to the report and its recommendations, your committee held meetings with the minister and officials of the Department of the Environment; with officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development led by Mr. G. Neil Faulkner, Assistant Deputy Minister, Northern Affairs Program, DIAND. The committee met with officials of the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration led by Mr. Maurice Taschereau, the administrator; and finally, it met with officials of the National Energy Board led by Mr. C. G. Edge, Chairman.

In addition, the committee sought the views of industry, the public at large and territorial governments by way of correspondence. In reviewing these meetings and correspondence, I think I can respectfully conclude that the committee provided a clear momentum and initiative for three important federal government programs in the north.

The first program is known as the Northern Regulatory Review; the second, the Northern Oil and Gas Action Program; and, finally, the Northern Land Use Planning Program. All of these programs have been initiated in the last year at the prompting and with the concurrence of the special committee.

Let me deal first with the Northern Regulatory Review. The subcommittee, in its examination of northern development and the transportation of hydrocarbons north of 60°, recognized that the process of arriving at decisions on major projects had evolved from a very simple cabinet approval to a vast array of complex departmental and regulatory procedures. The objectives, therefore, of the Northern Regulatory Review which has been put in place as a result of our recommendations, seek to identify all of the gaps, the overlaps and the bottlenecks with a view to streamlining and possibly simplifying the government processes that bear upon economic development. At present, the review is in the form of a proposal. This proposal will be presented to Cabinet and is expected to take up to 18 months to complete.

With regard to the Northern Regulatory Review, we have the response of the National Energy Board. The board, on its part, is now conducting a massive overhaul of its regulations and information requirements to simplify, clarify and otherwise streamline provisions to the greatest extent possible. It is the view of the board that the committee had succeeded in increasing pressure to delete certain regulatory requirements. In addition, the National Energy Board has some 25 projects under review, many of which will be finished at the end of 1984. That is to say, there are 25 projects under review designed to streamline the procedures and requirements of the National Energy Board in reaching its decisions.

In addition, three measures have now been put in place by the National Energy Board to assist proponents in putting forward their programs to the board and identifying areas of concern prior to these programs being examined by the board officially. In other words, informal pre-hearing conferences with proponents are held where areas of concern can be identified. In addition, there are meetings between the National Energy Board staff and the prospective applicants, again prior to the proponent putting forward the documents for its official application, and, finally, there are phased hearings. These measures have all been put in place as a result of our report.

In addition, there is increased co-operation between the National Energy Board and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration with respect to technical regulations for offshore pipelines where both administrations are involved. In other words, they are seeking to identify and put in place co-ordination of the various departments, thereby assisting the proponents in their respective projects.

The second very important federal government initiative which has been put in place, subsequent to our report, is the revised Northern Oil and Gas Action Program. This is a $130 million, seven-year program which entails a federal government planning and research program which will be the cornerstone for federal government hydrocarbon development strategies in the north. This is a conscious effort to be fully prepared for northern hydrocarbon development, rather than merely reacting to the development. That program, NOGAP, Northern Oil and Gas Action Program, answered, if not all, many of the concerns which we had put forward with respect to development in the Beaufort Sea region, the cold ocean technologies, support systems which had to be put in place for navigation, year-round Arctic response capability and the transport of hydrocarbons.

Finally, the third program, the Northern Land Use Planning Program. As we expressed in our report at the time, one of our concerns was the need for an overall land use planning program covering the north; that before proponents could adequately deal with the demands placed upon them, they needed some concept of what the rules would be with respect to land use. In other words, it is pointless to plan certain exploration projects in areas that are obviously committed to non-use for exploratory purposes. Therefore, what was needed was a clear land use policy evolved by the governments concerned in the north, by the federal government and by the people living in the north. As a result, that policy has been put in place through the Northern Land Use Planning Program. Playing their parts in that plan are all the departments, the governments of the territories concerned and, most important, the people of the north who will have input into evolving land use policy in the north. At the present time, some 16 areas have been identified which will be proceeded with and completed within seven years, commencing in 1984.

In addition, honourable senators, we have learned that there were numerous other initiatives which were undertaken to address the concerns expressed by the senators in their report. A comprehensive review of operating and safety standards relating to production and exploration has been conducted by the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration which has resulted in the revised safety guidelines now being issued. One of the concerns we expressed in our report was the participation of northerners in the development of their area. One area of concern which was continually referred to in our deliberations by my colleague, Senator Adams, was the participation of young people in seeking training in order that they might meaningfully participate in this development. That concern was also expressed in our report. The Department of Manpower and Immigration contemplated our report, and the National Industrial Training Program and the Institutional Training Program for Northern Residents, dedicated to skill-training of northerners in the north, received an additional $4.2 million in the 1983-84 year and a further $2.6 million is being sought for the 1984-85 year. That is a fund to provide schools for young native people to learn the skills they need to participate in the development of the north.

In our report we recommended that a co-ordinator be appointed in order to deal with the various complex issues that arise from time to time with regard to major projects. These issues are complex in that there is input from the Government of Canada, input from the government of the territory or the province involved and input from the local community. It was our view that a co-ordinator was needed who would be on-site on the projects, assisting the proponent and assisting all of the people living within the area, or assisting the government to co-ordinate the work of the proponent. This recommendation was accepted, and in the $1.1 billion Norman Wells Oil Field Expansion and Pipeline Project a co-ordinator was put in place from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with assistance from the Government of the Northwest Territories and the National Energy Board. However, all of the government issues are to be resolved through that one co-ordinator.

The results show that this one project seems to have worked very well. The co-ordinator was put there on a pilot project, and because it has worked so well it will be adopted for future projects. In addition, a co-ordinating office has been established at Inuvik which will focus on government response to regional and community concerns.

The committee, in its report, expressed the view that high priority should be given to research initiatives for the development of experimental technology to keep Canada in the forefront or the leading edge of cold ocean technology. Your committee is pleased to learn that the National Research Council Institute for Cold Regions Research will be established in Edmonton, a $13 million institute with a $7.2 million operating budget. That institute will no doubt become the world centre for northern engineering studies.

Of the 21 recommendations which your committee made, I can report to you, honourable senators, as is indicated in the report, that 17 were accepted by the government and are currently in the process of being put in place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hastings: Three were not accepted, being considered to be premature and to require further study. It is interesting to note, however, that one of those which was considered premature—that is, the recommendation that transportation from the Arctic “commence by tanker”—forms part of the first application the government has received from Panarctic to transport oil from Bent Horn Island in the north. So it may not have been quite as premature as the government indicated.

The foremost result of the report was to stimulate dialogue among the interested parties in northern hydrocarbon development. Mr. Edge, the Chairman of the National Energy Board, recognized this when he said: “Thanks in part to your contribution, the Board believes that governments, regulators and industry are indeed beginning to march to the beat of the same drum”. The government of the Northwest Territories supports, generally, the federal response to the Senate report. For its part, industry endorsed the recommendations of the special committee.

The report and the response and the results clearly indicate the very worthwhile work done by Senate committees, and is another indication of the contribution the Senate can make in building bridges of understanding between governments, agencies and the people concerned.

I also respectfully submit to honourable senators that the report has achieved that high degree of excellence which you have come to expect from your committees. I can assure you that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will eagerly accept the suggestion made to it by the Minister of the Environment that it continue its scrutiny over the next few years to ensure that northern hydrocarbon development contributes to a pattern of sound northern development. We accept that invitation because we are aware that sometimes programs do not get off the ground; we are aware that sometimes the initiatives, while in the conception stage, do not get under way.

With that thought in mind, and being mindful of our responsibility to the people of the north, to those with whom we have established contact and with whom we have worked, and being also mindful of our responsibility to the Senate and to the industry and to all those concerned, I say to the minister that we accept his invitation and will continue to scrutinize those various programs in the future—over the next four, five or ten years—in order to ensure that that development proceeds in a manner which will be of greatest benefit to the people of Canada, but more particularly to those most closely affected, the people of the north.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): As honourable senators will recall, this document is entitled Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on the Federal Government Response to the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline: "Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum." I remember clearly that we were all very much impressed with the work of that committee in producing that report. Often we think that reports are made, and, as the hackneyed phrase is, gather dust. I think I speak for many honourable senators when I thank Senator Hastings and the members of his committee for following up on this to determine what the response of the government was. As he said, out of 21 recommendations, 17 have been accepted and are being implemented and three are under review.

So I think it is a commendable program to have a committee not only make an excellent report, as it did, but to follow it up.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, SEOUL, KOREA—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea, 4th to 12th October, 1983, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to what Senator Bosa had to say about the Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, held in Seoul, Korea. I also heard Senator Rowe's remarks about this trip.

I may add that I myself was favourably impressed by the hospitality and friendship shown the Canadian delegation by the Koreans, and it was much appreciated. Although the Korean people went through a very difficult time during our stay in their country, they showed great self-control and managed to cope with a problematic situation.

I have fond memories of my trip to Korea. In fact, the meeting was most interesting, despite the absence of a major group in that country which, for political reasons, preferred not to attend the conference.

After these remarks, honourable senators, I think we can consider that the debate on this inquiry is now concluded.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, as no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 25, 1984, at 8 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Wednesday, June 20, 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 25)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and to the Order of Reference approved by the Senate on February 21, 1984, and by the House of Commons on February 23, 1984, your Committee has determined to draw to the attention of both Houses various practices followed in the setting of fees pursuant to Section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-10.

2. Section 13(b) provides that:

"13. Where a service or the use of a facility is provided by Her Majesty to any person and the Governor in Council is of opinion that the whole or part of the cost of providing the service or the use of the facility should be borne by the person to whom it is provided, the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, may

(b) notwithstanding the provisions of any Act relating to that service or the use of that facility but subject to and in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be specified by the Governor in Council, authorize the appropriate Minister to prescribe the fee or charge to be paid by the person to whom the service or the use of the facility is provided."

In its Second Report for the 1976-77 Session, your Committee expressed its view that all authorizing Orders in Council made pursuant to this statutory power should be published in order to permit verification of the validity of fees subsequently set by a Minister. Your Committee also reported that:

The Privy Council Office has agreed that in future cases section 13 of the Financial Administration Act will be cited as the enabling authority along with the Order in Council made thereunder, which will in future be published as a matter of public interest in Part II of the Canada Gazette.

Your Committee is of the view that the authority given to a Minister to determine fees should invariably be expressed to be exercisable "by order" so as to ensure that the resulting instrument will be considered a "statutory instrument" by the Crown. The legal advisers to the Crown have long taken the position that whether a legislative instrument is a statutory instrument or not depends in part on whether the enabling power contains a "magic formula" such as "by order", "by regulation", etc. While your Committee has never accepted this test, it has nonetheless been forced by the Crown to live with its consequences. For this reason, your Committee considers that every authorizing Order in Council adopted pursuant to Section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act should contain the "magic formula" so that a Minister's prescription of fees to be paid for a service or the use of a facility will always be treated as a statutory instrument under the Statutory Instruments Act and published in the Canada Gazette.

In a letter dated May 30, 1980, the President of the Treasury Board informed your Committee that:

"...there may be occasions when, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, this is not desirable, as for example when the fees are not of general application and the recipient of the service may have some objection to their publication."

In a further letter of March 6, 1981, the Minister explained that he was referring to "situations where, for example, confidentiality of commercial propriety (sic) might be of principle (sic) concern when providing Crown facilities or services". Particular examples given by the Minister included instances "where a provincial or foreign government chose to use Crown facilities to conduct certain tests the nature of which, according to such government, warrant absolute secrecy" or "when a person (company or individual) wishes to use Crown facilities to test or develop defence or security equipment, knowledge of which could affect, inter alia, the person's competitive position in the international market place".

Your Committee does not dispute that there may be cases in which it is desirable to treat a Minister's prescription of fees in a confidential manner. Your Committee does not accept, however, that the Executive is at liberty to decide by itself, and without Parliamentary approval, that certain fees are to be kept secret. Your Committee is of the view that if it is desired to have power to prescribe secret fees by executive order, Section 13(b) should be amended to confer such power explicitly and in such terms as limit the prescription of secret or unpublished fees to circumstances set by Parliament.

3. Even in those cases where fees orders are published, your Committee has noted an unexplained inconsistency in the registration practices of the Privy Council Office. Some fees orders, made pursuant to an authorizing Order in Council which contains the magic formula, are treated as statutory instruments and registered under the SI designation by the Registrar of Statutory Instruments while others, also made under an Order in Council containing the magic formula, are treated as regulations and registered under the SOR designation.

4. Your Committee's position is that, while Section 13 of the Financial Administration Act continues unamended,

- (i) all authorizing Orders in Council should be registered and published in the Canada Gazette;
- (ii) all authorizing Orders in Council should provide for the exercise of the power to prescribe fees by means of an order of the Minister; and

(iii) all ministerial fees orders are regulations and should be registered and published as such under the SOR designation.

5. If certain fees or charges imposed under the authority of Section 13 of the Financial Administration Act are to be kept secret and concealed from Parliamentary and public scrutiny, your Committee considers that it would be necessary that Section 13 of the Act be amended to provide expressly for such exceptions to the regular processes of subordinate law making.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Wednesday, June 20, 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 26)

In relation to its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and to the Order of Reference approved by the Senate on February 21, 1984, and by the House of Commons on February 23, 1984, your Committee has determined to draw the special attention of both Houses to the making of retroactive regulations pursuant to Section 221 of the Income Tax Act and to the related failure of the Minister of Finance to reply to your Committee's request for information.

Section 221(2) of the Income Tax Act provides that:

"No regulation under this Act has effect until it has been published in the Canada Gazette but, when so published, a regulation shall, if it so provides, be effective with reference to a period before it was published".

This provision is relied upon to authorize the making of regulations which are often expressed to apply as of a date many years before that of their approval by the Governor in Council. Although there is little doubt that there are situations in which it is necessary to make regulations retroactive to a date prior to their making, your Committee does not consider that the statutory authorization for such retroactivity should be unrestricted in its terms as is the case with Section 221(2) of the Act. As matters now stand, it is possible for the Government to make a regulation retroactive to any point in the past, however distant, with or without good reason.

In your Committee's view, an unlimited power to legislate retroactively is inherently dangerous: what is involved is not whether those at present administering the Income Tax Act and Regulations would seek to go beyond the bounds of fairness and propriety in making a retroactive regulation, but that the potential for abuse exists. Your Committee would wish to see Section 221 of the Act amended.

Therefore, your Committee recommends that the Government consider the advisability of amending Section 221 of the Income Tax Act so as to clearly specify the circumstances in which retroactive regulations may be made by the Governor in Council.

Following earlier correspondence, the Joint-Chairmen and Vice-Chairman of the Committee wrote the annexed letter to the Minister of Finance on March 19, 1982. Despite subsequent reminders dated November 22, 1982, April 15, 1983 and August 18, 1983 no acknowledgement or reply was ever received by your Committee. On April 12, 1984, the Joint-Chairmen and Vice-Chairman again wrote to the Minister and, after referring to this previous correspondence, requested that the Minister reply to their original letter before May 12, 1984. As of this date, no reply has been received to this last letter.

Your Committee finds it completely unacceptable for a Minister of the Crown to ignore for a period of over two years and in spite of repeated reminders, correspondence addressed to him on behalf of a Parliamentary Committee.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Wednesday, 20 June 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 27)

In relation to its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and to the Order of Reference approved by the Senate on February 21, 1984, and by the House of Commons on February 23, 1984, your Committee wishes to draw the following instruments to the attention of both Houses:

- SI/79-71, Sales Tax Remission Order
- SI/79-72, Customs Tariff Remission Order, 1979
- SI/79-73, Canadian Exploration Expense Remission Order
- SI/80-25, Customs Tariff Remission Order, Multilateral Trade Negotiations
- SI/80-30, Financial Institution Dividends Remission Order.

Your Committee also draws the special attention of both Houses to the failure of the Minister of Finance to reply to inquiries of your Committee in relation thereto.

The remission orders under Report were made pursuant to Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act which authorizes the Governor in Council to remit any tax, fee or penalty whenever he considers it to be in the public interest to do so. The purpose of the orders under Report, as that of similar orders made since, was to implement certain tax changes announced in Government Budgets pending the adoption, by Parliament, of the legislation required to give legal effect to those financial proposals. Orders of this kind will generally be of a temporary nature and are only intended to operate until the legislation flowing from the budgetary measures announced by the Government has been introduced and adopted by both Houses.

Your Committee has previously made known to Parliament its reservations as to the propriety of this use of the remission authority conferred by the Financial Administration Act; in its Second Report for the 1976-77 Session, your Committee indicated that it was concerned with the frequency and nature of the use of remission orders under Section 17 to grant general remissions of customs duty, excise and other taxes. Then as today, what appears to your Committee to be a power originally intended for use in exceptional circumstances has become routinely used for the temporary implementation of governmental policies. This concern has been shared by others; in notes appended to his decision in Clarkson Co. Ltd. v. The Queen, (1979) 94 D.L.R. (3d) 348, 365, the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Appeal queried whether Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act was meant to authorize general remission orders which effectively amend the relevant taxing Statutes, as opposed to the remission of specific tax liability in individual cases. The general tenor of Section 17 tends to confirm that the remission authority conferred on the Governor in Council was intended to be invoked in individual instances rather than in order to implement the financial policies of the Government prior to the enactment of legislation by Parliament.

Your Committee believes that if it is desired to resort to remission orders for this purpose, it would be preferable that Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act be amended so as to expressly provide for the making of such orders. The exercise of the remission authority to effect changes in the general law should also, in your Committee's view, be subject to well defined limitations as to the duration and consequences of such orders. Where, for example, a measure announced in a Budget is implemented by means of a remission order pending passage of the required legislation in Parliament, the Act should provide the order will cease to have any force or effect unless the required legislation is adopted within a certain period of time. This, it would seem to your Committee, is the minimum required if Parliament is to maintain its traditional control over the financial initiatives of the Government.

The Joint Chairmen of the Committee wrote the annexed letter to the Minister of Finance on March 19, 1981. Despite three subsequent reminders dated November 16, 1981, April 18 1983 and December 6, 1983, that letter was neither acknowledged nor replied to. On April 12, 1984, the Joint Chairmen and Vice-Chairman again wrote to the Minister and conveyed to him the Committee's request for a reply to the Joint Chairmen's original letter within a month. As of this date, this letter remains unanswered. Your Committee considers it intolerable that a Minister of the Crown would ignore a Committee of this Parliament in this manner.

In consequence, your Committee recommends that the Government consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act to clarify the Governor in Council's authority to introduce changes in the law by means of remission orders and subject any such orders to conditions limiting their duration in a manner consistent with the traditions of Parliamentary government.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

Wednesday, June 20, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, which was authorized to review the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline entitled, Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of February 2, 1984, proceeded to that review and now presents its:

FIRST REPORT

REPORT OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES ON THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO THE REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE ON THE NORTHERN PIPELINE:

Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has the honour to present its First Report, a review of the Federal Government response to the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline entitled: Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum.

Pursuant to its Order of Reference of February 2, 1984, "that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to review the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, tabled in the Senate on 30th March, 1983, and to enquire into any matter related thereto", the Committee met with the Minister and officials from the Department of the Environment (DOE), with officials from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (DIAND) and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration (COGLA), and the Chairman and officials of the National Energy Board (NEB).

Response by Government Departments and Agencies

According to the Federal Response to (the) Report of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline on Transportation of Petroleum and Natural Gas North of 60°, "the Senate Committee has conducted a major assessment of the technical, environmental and social implications of alternate transportation proposals for the Arctic Region and government is most interested in its views and recommendations." Furthermore, the Committee "has identified many critical concerns and issues which government agrees must be addressed if northern hydrocarbon development is to proceed in an orderly and responsible manner."

Mr. G. Neil Faulkner, Assistant Deputy Minister, Northern Affairs Program, DIAND, pointed out that as a result of the report "a large number of activities are under way that respond directly or indirectly to measures which Honourable Senators have suggested."

The Honourable Charles Caccia, Minister of the Department of the Environment, concluded his presentation to the Standing Committee by saying: "I believe that members of this Committee can take some measure of satisfaction in having increased pressure both inside and outside government to build up those processes and services necessary for effective and efficient government regulation of northern hydrocarbon activity." This view was reinforced by the Chairman of the National Energy Board, Mr. C. G. Edge, who pointed out that the Committee's work and report have made a major contribution to the developing harmony between governments, regulators and industry.

The National Research Council of Canada was encouraged to note the Special Committee's emphasis on technical competence, operating and safety standards and the development of experimental technologies that strengthen Canada's position in the forefront of cold ocean technology.

The Status of Implementation as of May 1984 of the Special Committee's recommendations is appended to this report.

The Regulatory Process1. Regulatory Review

During the course of the hearings which formed the basis for its report, Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum, the Special Committee recognized that the process of arriving at decisions on major development projects had evolved from simple Cabinet approval to a vast and complex array of departmental and regulatory procedures.

Among the recommendations made by the Committee to improve the regulatory process was that "... the regulatory processes and regulations of appropriate responsible agencies be reviewed to determine whether these fulfill the policy objectives for which they were intended and that obvious redundancies be eliminated".

This recommendation provided the momentum for the proposed Northern Regulatory Review. "The objective of the Northern Regulatory Review is to identify gaps, overlaps and bottlenecks with a view to streamlining and possibly simplifying government processes that bear upon economic development and effective environmental and resource management in the north" (Federal Response). At present, the review is in the form of a proposal to come before cabinet. Preparatory work for it is progressing and the review will require up to eighteen months beyond approval to complete.

The National Energy Board, for its part, is conducting a massive overhaul of its regulations and information requirements to simplify, clarify and otherwise streamline these provisions to the greatest extent possible. It is the view of the Board that the Committee has succeeded in increasing pressure to delete certain regulatory requirements, minimize duplication and foster co-ordination amongst governments, regulators and industry. Furthermore, the Board will be collaborating with DIAND on the Northern Regulatory Review.

The NEB reported that a great deal of progress has been made with respect to the Committee's recommendation for a rationalization of the regulatory process. The Board has some twenty-five review projects underway, many of which will be finalized by year-end 1984.

Responding to the Special Committee's report, the Board outlined further improvements to the regulatory process. Three measures being employed to expedite the regulatory process are: pre-hearing conferences, meetings between the NEB staff and prospective applicants and finally, phased hearings.

The NEB pointed to increased co-ordination in its dealings with COGLA as a clear example of reduction in regulation. The Board and COGLA recently reached an agreement in principle to establish identical technical regulations with respect to offshore pipelines where both are involved.

2. Northern Policy and Planning

The Special Committee concluded that the Federal Government had in place elements of a policy framework for northern hydrocarbon development. This policy framework should provide the basis for evaluating the relevancy of the existing assessment process.

The policy objectives however, required further delineation by the Federal Government and consequently, the Committee recommended "That the Senior Policy Committee on Northern Resource Development Projects fulfill the function of promoting interdepartmental discussion of northern development policy outside matters relating to the Canada Oil and Gas Act. Based on these discussions, it should forward policy recommendations to appropriate Ministers for action."

According to the Federal Response, "Government is moving quickly to develop policies and planning necessary to round out the policy picture." The Senior Policy Committee, chaired by the Assistant Deputy Minister, Northern Affairs, DIAND, includes Assistant Deputy Ministers from the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Environment, Fisheries and Oceans, Transport, Regional Industrial Expansion, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, the Deputy Commissioner of the Government of the Northwest Territories and the Deputy Minister of Intergovernmental Relations, Government of the Yukon Territory. It has become more active in promoting the interdepartmental discussion and deliberation required to harmonize government policies and programs. This interdepartmental committee was also used in co-ordinating and reaching a consensus on the response of the Federal Government to the Special Committee's report. This exercise is a concrete illustration of the kind of interdepartmental discussion on northern development recommended by the Special Committee.

3. Approval-in-Principle

The Special Committee recommended "That Cabinet may introduce approval-in-principle decisions for major energy projects once the nature of the information to be provided has been established." This recommendation addressed the problem facing proponents of major projects who must absorb the cost of undertaking a mass of technical work before having a clear idea of whether the investment fits the priorities of the Federal Government.

The Northern Regulatory Review will include a thorough assessment of the approval-in-principle concept.

Although the NEB believes that approval-in-principle could create certain difficulties, it does concede that there is a problem for industry. To remedy this problem the Board proposes an Early Hearing Process which, by various means, could give industry an advance indication regarding its development proposals.

4. Use of Existing Information

The Committee further recognized that, particularly in the environmental dimension, several assessment processes overlap. It concluded that it should be possible to rely much more on existing information and to treat each review process as a segment of the whole regulatory regime to avoid repetition. The Special Committee therefore recommended "That certain review procedures should only come into play when the subject matter has not been evaluated in another forum or when public interest considerations warrant. Use of existing information should be emphasized."

Progress is being made to reduce duplication and to increase co-ordination between agencies, particularly with regard to the interface between the Environmental Assessment and Review Process (EARP) and the NEB. The NEB welcomes the filing of an EARP Panel report at its hearings, when such a report is available; in this way, the Board can make its decisions on the basis of the fullest possible information at hand. This use of existing information by the Board reduces unnecessary duplication and expedites the regulatory process.

DIAND is in the process of establishing, within its recently created Project Development Division, a Regulation and Assessment of Major Projects Process (RAMP) which will endeavour to minimize impediments to evaluating resource projects. The RAMP mechanism should also reduce overlap or duplication in the review and implementation of hydrocarbon projects.

5. Federal Co-ordinator

In the view of the Committee, the complexity of the decision-making process was increasing and, therefore, warranted a federal official acting in the capacity of federal co-ordinator/expeditor to assist project sponsors in meeting regulatory requirements. The Committee therefore recommended "That the appointment of a federal co-ordinator to each major project, responsible to a designated Minister, be tried on a pilot basis to test its suitability. After a designated period of time has passed, the mechanism should be reviewed and a decision made on its suitability."

Three co-ordinators were appointed to the $1.1 billion Norman Wells oil field expansion and pipeline project. The overall co-ordinator is from DIAND; these efforts are supported by the work of co-ordinators representing the NEB and the Government of the Northwest Territories. The use of co-ordinators at Norman Wells is a pilot project which is being carefully monitored and evaluated to determine both its effectiveness and its possible application to major resource developments in the future.

DIAND's Project Development Division is a further effort on the part of the Federal Government to co-ordinate and facilitate the development of major projects.

Another initiative along the lines of the Committee's recommendation is the establishment in Inuvik of the Mackenzie Delta/Beaufort Sea Co-ordinating Office. It will provide a means of focussing the government response to regional and community concerns.

The Northern Oil and Gas Action Program (NOGAP)

Many of the Special Committee's recommendations have been implemented through the revised $130 million, seven-year Northern Oil and Gas Action Program (NOGAP).

1. Northern Hydrocarbon Development

The Committee believed that northern development policy and planning needed to be fleshed out more fully, so that the Federal Government would be properly prepared for hydrocarbon development in the North. Hence, the first recommendation of the Committee was "That Federal Government policy and planning related to such matters as northern energy, land use, environmental management, manpower training and infrastructure development be formulated early in 1983." One of the major concerns of NOGAP is to address planning and research activities to achieve this state of readiness.

The Northern Oil and Gas Action Program is the cornerstone of the Federal Government's northern hydrocarbon development strategy. It is a conscious effort to be fully prepared for northern hydrocarbon development, rather than merely reacting to such development.

2. Monitoring in the Beaufort Sea Region

The Committee recognized that industry is searching for answers to many of the technical problems in its efforts to arrive at safe and economic means of producing hydrocarbons on the Beaufort Sea Region. Nonetheless, the onus is on the Federal Government to anticipate safety requirements and devise clear reporting and regulatory procedures to ensure that the impact of these technologies is beneficial. If the Federal Government is to anticipate problems associated with the introduction of new technologies, then its expertise must match that of industry.

The Committee recommended "That the activities and techniques of each phase of the incremental development proposal for the Beaufort Sea Region be carefully monitored by the responsible Federal Government agency for technical competence and suitability for year-round operation."

NOGAP responds to this recommendation with several initiatives. These include the development of a socio-economic monitoring system with physical and environmental monitoring and the identification of environmental guidelines and of an evaluation monitoring methodology. These initiatives are part of the Regulation and Assessment of Major Projects (RAMP) mechanism of DIAND's Project Development Division.

3. Cold Ocean Technology

The Committee noted that new technologies suited to arctic conditions offer an unprecedented opportunity to augment Canadian industrial capacity, and that improving state-of-the-art technology would both maximize the efficiency of operations carried out in Canada and provide the opportunity for Canada to compete around the world. Mindful of the need to sustain the present momentum resulting from advances by both government and industry in Canadian technological capacity, the Committee recommended "That high priority be given by government and industry to financial and research initiatives for the development of experimental technologies that may advance Canada's position in the forefront of cold ocean technology."

The Standing Committee is pleased to learn that a National Research Council Institute for Cold Regions Research will be established in Edmonton at a cost of $13 million. It will have an annual operating budget of $7.2 million. The Institute, which will be fully operational by 1988, should become a world centre for northern engineering studies.

The Federal Government's response to this recommendation is further evidenced by the substantial amount of money from the energy research and development fund which is presently being spent in this area. Moreover, additional funds, drawn from NOGAP, will be directed towards research initiatives for the development of experimental technologies.

4. Support Systems

NOGAP also responds to the Committee's recommendation "That all support systems in relation to such marine services as ice monitoring, weather forecasting, navigation, search and rescue and marine escort which are necessary to ensure the reliability and the safety of production and transportation systems be in place before production commences." NOGAP studies will assess the geological, hydrological and climatological characteristics in areas where major hydrocarbon developments are planned. Examples of other studies include coastal zone dynamics and ice formation, seabed conditions and seabed geological hazards.

5. Year-round Arctic Response Capability

The Committee was sympathetic to the difficulties with which the Canadian Coast Guard, Canada's principal marine presence, is faced in committing its meagre financial and personnel resources in support of year-round marine services in arctic waters. Its surveillance role requires that it respond to pollution emergencies and, furthermore, that it carry out its support function in search and rescue operations and marine distress incidents. The Committee therefore recommended "That, in order to upgrade the Federal Government's year-round arctic response capability, the Canadian Coast Guard be provided with adequate financial and personnel resources to conduct R and D, to supply marine support services and to meet emergencies."

Again, NOGAP will provide additional funding,—this time for the Canadian Coast Guard—which will be used for studying transportation management, assessment and development of arctic navigation systems and for assessing search and rescue systems.

The Standing Committee is gratified to learn that a contract has been signed for the construction of a $91.3 million Type 1200 icebreaker which will contribute to updating the Canadian Coast Guard fleet. This vessel will carry state-of-the-art navigation and communications equipment to aid in providing icebreaking support to shipping both during the summer in the Canadian Arctic and during the winter, primarily in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Newfoundland areas.

6. Transport of Hydrocarbons

In considering alternate transportation systems proposed by industry, the Committee agreed that under certain conditions both pipeline and tanker systems are technically and environmentally feasible for the transport of hydrocarbons from the Arctic. Of these two transportation modes, the Committee considered that beginning with tanker transport was preferable for several reasons; it therefore recommended "That transport of hydrocarbons from the arctic region commence by tanker on a small scale and that consideration be given to various combinations of tanker and/or pipelines systems as other factors warrant."

A decision on the preferred mode of transport has not yet been made and NOGAP will focus federal planning and research on these two alternatives.

Land Claims

The Special Committee recommended "That the federal government give high priority to settling land claims and resolving issues relating to constitutional evolution."

We are gratified by the recent progress made in resolving native land claims.

Environmental Management and Regional Planning

The Committee's first recommendation included a call for the formulation of policy and planning with respect to land use and environmental management. A subsequent recommendation, "That the Federal Government expedite the regional planning process and that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development inaugurate a planning mechanism to allow participatory regional planning to proceed effectively", complemented the first and incorporated the Committee's position on regional planning.

These recommendations resulted in the creation of the Northern Land Use Planning Program (NLUP). The purpose of the NLUP Program is to develop a consensus on the type of development and land-use planning that ought to occur in the different regions of the North. DIAND is responsible for the program and, through consultation and planning with other departments and the territorial governments, will seek agreement as to the nature of the major activities that should take place within a given region. A central feature of the program is that it will establish a framework for local and regional development, and provide northerners with a direct voice in determining the best use for land resources.

According to the Minister of the Environment, proposed conservation areas of concern to his department will be integrated into the program.

The NLUP Program will be inaugurated in 1984. At present, some sixteen areas have been identified in the North for land-use planning. Funds have been allotted to the Program and a consultative process between governments and residents of the North is in place.

Conclusion

The report of the Special Committee, Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum, clearly provided the momentum for at least three Federal Government programs: the Northern Regulatory Review, the revised Northern Oil and Gas Action Program (NOGAP) and the Northern Land Use Planning Program (NLUP).

The foremost result of the report was to stimulate dialogue among the interested parties in northern hydrocarbon development. Mr. Edge recognized this when he said: "Thanks in part to your contribution, the Board believes that governments, regulators and industry are indeed beginning to march to the beat of the same drum."

The Government of the Northwest Territories is represented on the Senior Policy Committee and generally supports the Federal Government response.

In correspondence with the Committee, representatives of industry endorse the recommendations of the Special Committee and consider that it is now largely a matter of the recommendations being implemented by the appropriate bodies.

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will accept the invitation of the Minister of the Environment to "continue its scrutiny over the next few years to ensure that northern hydrocarbon development contributes to a pattern of northern development that will be remarkable for what northerners and Canadians as a whole have gained, not lost."

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 26, 1984, at 11 a.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this evening we expect that second reading will be given to two non-controversial bills which were referred to earlier in the proceedings; that is, Bill C-37 and C-40. However, if that does not occur we will be able to continue with the debate on the motion for second reading of those bills tomorrow morning.

If second reading is given, then those two bills should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. We will not likely complete second reading debate on Bill C-9 tonight. However, we may be able to accomplish that tomorrow. That is why we will sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. In this way the committees can perform their work with respect to these bills tomorrow afternoon if the bills are referred to committee tonight or tomorrow morning.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do I understand that no other committee will be sitting tomorrow morning with the exception of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology? That committee is, I understand, sitting at 9.00 or 9.30 with respect to the bills we now have before us, should they receive second reading tonight. Is that the idea?

Senator Frith: I am not sure that we will get second reading of those two bills this evening. That is why we are sitting tomorrow morning and leaving the afternoon free for committees. In other words, these bills do not have to receive second reading tonight.

Senator Flynn: So no committee is sitting tomorrow morning?

Senator Frith: No committee scheduled to sit tomorrow morning will be dealing with this legislation.

Senator Flynn: It is important for us to know if there will be some committees sitting tomorrow morning at the same time as the Senate is sitting.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are committees sitting at 9.30 a.m.; there is a committee sitting at 10.00 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration had planned to sit at 10.30 a.m., but that committee will now be sitting at 1.00 p.m., instead. That was the only direct conflict with the sitting of the Senate at 11.00 o'clock tomorrow. I therefore advised the committee chairmen concerned that the plan was that the Senate would be sitting at 11.00 a.m. tomorrow, and they have adjusted their plans accordingly.

Senator Flynn: I understand that it is the hope of the deputy leader that the Senate will adjourn before one o'clock tomorrow in order to keep the whole afternoon free for committee meetings, is that so?

Senator Frith: That is what I hope for, yes.
Motion agreed to.

[English]

CHARITIES

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate a question arising out of a news release of April 27, 1984. Perhaps I should have raised this matter before. The news release emanates from the office of the Secretary of State and indicates that a joint House of Commons and Senate committee on voluntary action will be established with a mandate to examine the adequacy of the current definition of charity to reflect social realities. I wonder if the deputy leader could give us some information on that matter?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that was raised perhaps a month or a month and a half ago. At that time I discussed it briefly with the Leader of the Opposition. The proposal was made by the Secretary of State to deal with that question of the definition of charities. I have heard nothing further since that time and therefore I have no up-to-date information. Indeed, I doubt if anything will happen about it before adjournment.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COST OF OPERATING EMBASSY IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I do not expect that the leader will have this information immediately available at his fingertips and I am sure he will want to take my question as notice.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could find out the total annual cost to the Canadian government of operating the Canadian Embassy in Washington, D.C.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senate Rowe has suggested, I will take that question as notice.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Has he received a recent report of the Canada Grains Council with respect to the economics of the Port of Churchill?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I may have received that report but I do not have it at hand. My office has very likely received it. I will check on this.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Next week?

Senator Roblin: After my honourable friend has determined whether somebody in his office has opened his mail, he might tell me if he has received that report because I want to ask him when he will make a statement as to the government's reaction to that statement. It bears very serious policy implications for the movement of western grain through the port of Churchill. Will he give me an undertaking to do that?

Senator Argue: I would be very pleased to.

Senator Roblin: I will refrain from asking when.

Senator Flynn: Next week.

Senator Argue: Are we sitting next week? I think that was the question, but I am not sure.

THE CONSTITUTION

RIGHTS OF FRANCO-ONTARIANS—REPRESENTATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not he has received an answer to the question I put to him for the outgoing Prime Minister.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will identify the subject matter of the question as well.

Senator Flynn: I asked whether the outgoing Prime Minister intended to write to the provincial premiers with respect to changing the Constitution, restoring the right of veto and/or providing the compensation to provinces who transfer their legislative competence to the federal Parliament.

Senator Olson: The subject matter of the question has been referred to the Prime Minister's Office. I am not sure that it is receiving the highest priority, but it requires a carefully considered reply.

Senator Flynn: Yes, next week, too.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Deputy Leader of the Government could tell us whether or not, before the summer adjournment which is scheduled to begin on Friday, we will receive answers to those questions which have been taken as notice.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I checked earlier this evening and found that there are only a few questions left to which a reply has not been given. I know that honourable senators sitting opposite sometimes do not regard the replies given as being adequate answers; nevertheless, they are entitled to a reply but not necessarily a satisfactory answer.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Apparently we are not even entitled to a reply, because in many cases you do not give one.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to refresh gently the memory of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I asked the Minister of State for Social Development some weeks ago if, when taking the shopping list regarding assistance to centres across the country—to towns, cities and so forth—it was possible that financial assistance could be given for the construction of a civic centre to be located in Sydney, Nova Scotia—not British Columbia. That question has not been responded to.

I also asked months and months ago a question relating to who would appoint the new members to the board of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, whether it would be the outgoing Prime Minister or the Prime Minister designate with the assistance of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I took at least one of those questions as notice. I shall have a reply as soon as one is available. I cannot answer the question until I have received a reply from those directly responsible. Perhaps tomorrow, when the Minister of State for Social Development is present, Senator Muir can redirect his question to him.

What I said a moment ago was that I reviewed all unanswered questions that I had taken as notice. I think there are very few left unanswered.

PRIVATE BILL

STADACONA MINES (1944) LIMITED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your committee to which was referred Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act to revive Stadacona Mines (1944) Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, June 13, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move, on behalf of Senator Asselin, that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès moved the second reading of Bill C-9, to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to ask that you support this bill. If there is a bill in this session which demonstrates more clearly the value of the Senate, I have not seen it nor has anybody else. It was drafted by this chamber, by one of our committees, and it is a remarkable document which achieves, as in no other country, a balance between the need for collective security and the need to preserve freedom of citizens. I do not think this bill is a partisan matter—at least not in this chamber. In the other place there are a few who believe in the doctrine that it is better to starve than to have three-quarters of a loaf, but they always refuse to sit in this chamber. I think here we can discuss this measure as something which we all realize is needed by the country.

I will not review the statistics of terrorism.

[Translation]

I can tell you that 64,000 people have been killed since 1970. Without saying how many spies we have in this country, I am sure you know we have quite a few.

[English]

We also have home-grown terrorists, political and otherwise. Most recently, a young lady, Juliet Belmas, took it upon herself to blow up the Litton Plant in Toronto; she injured 10 people. There are those among us who think that violence is a legitimate form of political dissent, even though it is not motivated by foreign countries; and there are those among us who are motivated by foreign agents to break the laws of this land and endanger the security of all Canadians.

This bill addresses itself to these problems. It creates a Canadian civilian security service which will to some extent be divorced from the RCMP. It is the RCMP that has carried out these duties until now since the Second World War. The new bill proposes a service which will not be operating under the RCMP, although the RCMP will handle the law enforcement that flows from many of the inquiries by the new service.

The points at issue are: Is this bill endangering the ordinary freedom of expression and freedom of legal, proper, political action of Canadian citizens? Is this bill sufficiently under the control of Parliament? Is this bill properly divorcing this service—the security and intelligence activity—from the RCMP? I think the bill achieves all these objectives and achieves them remarkably well.

No other country has legislation as good and as specific as that proposed by this bill. The FBI is operating on the basis of a three-line act passed in 1870, and on a slew of executive orders and regulations over which nobody now has any control. Mr. J. Edgar Hoover is a splendid illustration of what occult power a security service can gain if it is not properly controlled.

What this bill does is provide a definition of what a security service can do; of why it should go into operation; and of why and how it should be controlled. The definition of what is a security threat to Canada has been criticized in the other place as too lax. This chamber is full of eminent lawyers. Most of you would not have been as successful as you have been if laws could be so written that they did not lead to differing interpretations.

It is impossible, I claim, to write a definition of what is a security threat that will absolutely exclude any possible infringement of the privacy of somebody who is not engaged in nefarious activity. At some time or another there may be somebody who, while acting in good faith and without any violent intent, will be looked at by our security service.

We have been told that someone who is collecting money to provide help to the rebels of Afghanistan will be considered a legitimate target for the security service because he is encouraging violence against another country. We have also been told that people who are collecting money to help refugees from the Chile of General Pinochet might find themselves targets of the security service. It is true that the definition of what a security service can do can be distorted to the extent that one could believe such extremes will occur. The bill provides, however, that before agents of the security service can act they must obtain the permission of a federal judge. Instructions as to what is or what is not permissible are given to those judges. Before an agent of the security service acts, he must also inform the Solicitor General. The bill goes further than that and stipulates that every single action of the security service will be under the unrestricted investigation of an inspector general.

Honourable senators, these are the controls—these are the real guarantees. No matter what the text of the law is, there is the possibility of getting around it if we are talking about a bad apple, but there are safeguards against that happening. The Inspector General is one of those safeguards. The political supervision of the Solicitor General is another, as is the review committee, composed of privy councillors. These councillors do not serve in either chamber of Parliament and will have full access to all documentation—I will come back to the business of cabinet documents—and will be able to see that the security service does not abuse its powers; that it operates only to protect the security of Canada and its citizens and does not, fancifully, restrict the legitimate political freedom of those citizens.

Honourable senators, I do not think there is much to discuss on this bill. There is no other way of providing this service. I have written repeatedly on this legislation. I cannot find any way of tightening these definitions without, as the McDonald commission said, emasculating the proposed force. Honourable senators, most texts of law are compromises in one way or another and this is the best compromise possible in the circumstances. The controls are real. The supervision is strong. The review committee reports annually to Parliament, which will therefore have the right to oversee what the security service has done.

There is only one restriction placed upon the review committee, which is that it will not be able to compel Cabinet to release cabinet documents that the review committee might consider pertinent to the case. That does not mean that Cabinet will not make these documents available—Cabinet did release documents to the McDonald commission—but it does mean that Cabinet would have the right to hold back some of these documents if it is of the view that their release would be counterproductive.

As honourable senators are aware, there are discussions in Cabinet in which this or that minister might play the role of devil's advocate in order to clarify a particular issue. Cabinet documents are drafted by senior public servants, who also put more than one case forward. The pros and cons on any issue are discussed, and freely, because everyone knows that a cabinet document is confidential. Discussion in Cabinet is an essential process—this feeding to Cabinet of all aspects of a case by the senior public servants—and this process, in some instances, might be endangered and the country therefore might suffer if all cabinet documents could be released on demand of the review committee or any other body. The Privacy Act accepts the confidentiality of cabinet documents, as does the Canada Evidence Act; this particular bill accepts that confidentiality as well. As I have said, that does not mean that the Cabinet will not release such documents.

Honourable senators, I think this is a good bill. The only contentious issue that I have heard a senator raise to me personally is whether the Security Service should or should not continue to be under the RCMP. Taking the service away from the RCMP, as the Solicitor General has said, as the McDonald commission has said, as the Mackenzie commission said before that, and as the senate committee pointed out, is not a reflection on the excellence of the RCMP. We in Canada are very lucky to have such a police force. I believe there are only two countries in the world in which the police force is loved, namely, Britain and Canada. In most other countries it is hated. Having a police force that the country loves and trusts is an invaluable asset which we must preserve; and I submit, honourable senators, that one condition for loving and trusting a police force is a belief that it is non-political, that it is not involved in political activity.

Like it or not, the Security Service, by its very nature, is going to be involved in political activity. It will have to receive political direction. For instance, is it permissible to support an organization that wants to help the rebels in Afghanistan, which was invaded by a foreign country and where those rebels are fighting for their freedom? On the other hand, is it permissible to support the Red Brigades which are trying to overthrow the Government of Italy, which is a democratic government? I submit that it is a political decision. Guidance will have to be given to the Security Service by a politician—in this instance, the Solicitor General.

So there is political interference. There is a political role which is inevitable in the operation of a Security Service. Yet the tradition of good police forces is that they occupy themselves with criminal activities, with trying to prevent them, while they remain as aloof as possible from the political process. The RCMP has had the misfortune of having to face a mixture of situations: a political situation involving the Security Service and the essentially non-political defence of the peace and security of citizens that police work involves.

I submit to honourable senators that the reputation of the RCMP, and the love that the people of this country feel for that force, is based on its excellent police work, on the feeling our people have had that whatever their party or political opinion they could rely on the Mounties for a fair deal.

That is why the Mackenzie commission, the McDonald commission, and the Senate committee that examined this bill, all recommended divorcing the security activity from the RCMP, but not the law enforcement aspect which remains with the RCMP.

I consider this to be a good bill. I believe it is a bill which will give us something that no other country has, namely, a much better definition of the mandate of this service; much better protection of a citizen's right to dissent without fear of being considered disloyal or subversive for certain actions; much better control over the actions of the Security Service than exists in any other country; and it will help preserve the excellent reputation of the RCMP by divorcing it from activities which are political and leaving intact its relationship with Canadians, a relationship that it has enjoyed and fostered because of its excellence throughout all these years. That is why I ask for the support of honourable senators on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz was scheduled to speak to this bill tonight on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party. Unfortunately, he is unavoidably absent. Senator Nurgitz and other honourable senators on this side, particularly those who have taken part in the deliberations of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Canadian Security Intelligence Service on the now defunct Bill C-157, will be taking part in this debate later and at the appropriate time and stage will be proposing amendments to the bill.

The honourable senator who just resumed his seat does well to congratulate the special committee on its work and commentary on the previous Bill C-157. However, I think I should point out at the outset that in some quite important respects the government has not implemented in this bill recommendations of that Senate committee which, I think, would have gone some considerable way to easing the apprehensions which many people continue to feel about this bill. Senator Gigantès, in referring to the existence of various threats to the security of the country in the course of his speech mentioned the recent case involving a lady who had attempted to blow up the Litton installations. The example is well taken, but I think it is only fair to point out that the lady in question was pursued, apprehended, prosecuted, tried and sentenced under the present law without any need for the kind of agency and powers proposed in this bill. The honourable senator also said that this bill attempts to balance the need for collective security with freedom of the individual. He tried at several points in his speech to demonstrate how this bill with its various safeguards protects the freedom of the individual. He referred to the political supervision of the Solicitor General which, I must say as a matter of principle and experience, is a rather thin reed to lean on, and then to the review committee proposed by this bill which, as I hope to demonstrate in the course of my remarks, is quite inadequate, for reasons he also alluded to in his remarks.

I was slightly surprised to hear the honourable senator claim such great things for this new agency in the light of an article that he wrote a few weeks ago in the Montreal Gazette, in which he said of the proposed new service:

But we do need a service that can use dirty tricks to combat subversion. There are spies in this country and international terrorists. We must keep tabs on them.

The notion that we are setting up an agency for the purpose of using dirty tricks is not one the honourable senator emphasized in his speech this evening in commending the bill for second reading and is not one that I have explicitly heard, at any rate, from the other proponents of this bill, the ministers and members of the government who are recommending it to us.

I must say that some of his remarks this evening did not reassure me at all. I refer in particular to what I regard, at least, as an unfortunate choice of words when he posed the perhaps rhetorical questions on whether it is permissible for a Canadian to support the rebels in Afghanistan or whether it is permissible for a Canadian to support the Red Brigade. He told us that these are matters on which we will receive guidance in due course from the Solicitor General of Canada. As the honourable senator put it, this was the kind of political activity in which this new security service would be engaged. I must say that those remarks, coupled with his written article in the Montreal Gazette in which he recommends that we set up a service that can use dirty tricks, are not such as to reassure those of us who have very real concerns about this bill and about the proposed new agency.

I agree that it is important and, in fact, it is somewhat urgent that Parliament should act on the issues that are involved and at stake in this bill. Every knowledgeable person whom I have spoken to in the last few months—and I have spoken to a fair number of them on this matter—has emphasized the need to clear the air, and has stressed the danger of protracted delay on this matter.

The royal commission of inquiry headed by Mr. Justice David McDonald was appointed on July 6, 1977, just about seven years ago. Well before that date the security services of this country were under a cloud. Allegations had been made against them in Parliament and elsewhere and the security service was preoccupied with these allegations. A provincial royal commission was set up in the province of Quebec. Legal actions of various kinds ensued involving the security services. There were confusing and conflicting statements from members of the government for a period of time and there was, unfortunately, at times a conspicuous lack of support on the part of the government for the security service which, I believe, contributed to undermining public confidence in the security service and in damaging self-confidence and morale within the service. While the McDonald commission sat, it seemed, endlessly, they heard all the testimony and studied the matter thoroughly. They reported voluminously between October 1979 and August 1981. We had the now defunct Bill C-157 on which the special Senate committee under the chairmanship of our colleague, Senator Pitfield, made a study and report. Now, we have Bill C-9 on which there has been, as Senator Gigantès noted, considerable debate and lengthy committee sittings in the other place.

During all this time Canada's security services have been in a state of limbo. They could not know and they will not know until Parliament has acted on this bill and other issues involved in this bill what is to become of them. Under these circumstances recruiting has been very difficult. The state of uncertainty has caused apprehension among the friendly foreign security services with whom Canada must deal. Morale has been adversely affected and I must believe that the whole period of uncertainty has damaged the overall effectiveness of the security services in this country. So there is some urgency to addressing and resolving the issues that are at stake in this bill.

Having said that, I want to express my strong conviction that the bill should not pass without amendment, because there are important changes and improvements that ought to be made in it. I also agree that the security services should operate under a legislative mandate. I know there are some important countries where it has been possible for security services to operate with apparent success without such a mandate. In principle, I would be in favour of a legislative mandate, since I think it is important to subject all our actions to the rule of law. However, the events of the past seven or eight years make it imperative that the role of the security service be defined; that the lines of authority and responsibility be clarified; and that the security service operate under a mandate from Parliament.

I believe it is the lack of such a mandate which is at the root of some of the problems which have occurred in recent years—the lack of a mandate as well as the mixed signals which have been sent out from time to time from government and its ministers to the public and the security service with respect to these matters, and the dizzying succession of solicitors general. We have had nine of them in 16 years. As I have said, the regrettable lack of support on the part of important people in the government for the security service is one other factor at the root of the problem.

Thus, I favour a mandate for the security service. However, I say this bill is seriously flawed. As I indicated earlier, other senators on this side of the house will be proposing some amendments to the bill at the appropriate time.

I would now like to refer to some of the more serious flaws as I see them. The first is with respect to the definition of “threats to the security of Canada”. The definition is too broad and too loosely worded. The definition is broader in some respects than the one suggested by the McDonald royal commission. In other respects it is broader than considered necessary, or proper, by the Canadian Bar Association, by various provincial attorneys general and other competent witnesses. It is much to be regretted that the attempts of the opposition parties to amend the bill in the other place have been voted down by the government majority. Those amendments would have made the definition more acceptable and less open to subjective interpretation and abuse.

The second point, and not unrelated to the question of defining “threats to the security of Canada”, is the question of the duties and functions of the proposed new service and what limits there will be on the service in the collection of information and intelligence. Clause 12 limits the service in its collection of information and intelligence to what is “strictly necessary”. The McDonald commission recommended that clause 12 indicate that the agency’s work should be limited to what is “strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada”. Our committee endorsed the McDonald commission recommendation stating that the words “strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada” would have a salutary effect on the interpretation of the service’s mandate. As it is now worded, clause 12 states “strictly necessary”; further on in the bill there are references to the “security of Canada”. When one sees the words “strictly necessary” by themselves the question which arises is: “Strictly necessary” for what? In looking at this particular clause the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. McMurtry, said that while these words taken in isolation are appropriate, when read in the context of the new provisions they are virtually meaningless. He also said that they have been thoughtlessly and carelessly thrown into the middle of the provision in such a way that they give rise to more questions than they answer; and that service is directed to collect information to the extent that is strictly necessary; but the question “Strictly necessary for what?” is left unanswered. Mr. McMurtry points out that the result of leaving this question unanswered is to permit the service to define its own mandate.

I recognize that an argument could be made on the other side that in clause 12 there are references to “protecting the security of Canada.” However, for some reason which I find difficult to understand, the government has resisted attempts to clean up that clause and make it much clearer and more precise than it is.

I tell honourable senators that the change about which I am speaking has been urged upon the government not only by the Attorney General of Ontario but by the British Columbia Law Union, the Canadian Bar Association and the Attorney General of Saskatchewan. I very much regret that amendments proposed in the other place with respect to this matter were voted down by the government majority.

Most important, it seems to me the bill is gravely flawed in terms of the supervision of the proposed new service, the external review of its activities and its accountability to Parliament. Senator Gigantès made several points in his speech this evening with respect to parliamentary control. Frankly, provision for that does not exist in the bill except to the extent that the Solicitor General, like all ministers, is accountable to Parliament. There is no provision whatever for any parliamentary overview of the activities of this proposed new service.

It is proposed that there shall be an officer to be known as the “Inspector General” who will be appointed by Order in Council. He or she will be responsible to the deputy minister, that is, the Deputy Solicitor General. The Senate committee described the role of the Inspector General as being “the ministry’s eyes and ears on the service.” However, this Inspector General—the ministry’s eyes and ears on the service—will not be allowed to see cabinet documents. That is a major flaw. He or she is supposed to monitor compliance by the service with its operational policy. He or she is supposed to review the operational activities of the service. With what qualifications, with what expertise, with what information can the proposed Inspector General carry out this job without access to relevant cabinet documents? In answer to that question I quote the Attorney General of Ontario who said:

The danger is that this secrecy provision can permit the government to exercise political control over the activities of the service in a manner which is immune from effective review. I believe that there is great merit in the words of Professor Peter Russel, who said in relation to the denial of access to cabinet documents that:

A government that is itself so distrustful is not entitled to the trust that this legislation demands from the people it represents.

The bill before us proposes the establishment of a security intelligence review committee. This committee is to consist of three to five privy councillors who are not members of the Senate or the House of Commons. This is supposed to be one of the key safeguards which Senator Gigantès referred to a few moments ago. However, the proposal is badly flawed. The proposed security intelligence review committee will be allowed to review the operations of the new security service but not of other government agencies which are also dealing with intelligence and security matters.

There was abundant testimony before the Senate committee and, later, before the House of Commons committee studying Bill C-9, indicating that there are a number of other government agencies that have important security intelligence roles and facilities. There is the communications security establishment in the Department of National Defence; there are the security and intelligence responsibilities at External Affairs and at the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, and a security facility under the Department of Supply and Services. The new security service proposed in this bill will be interacting with all these other agencies and receiving information from them.

We believe that these other agencies that are involved in security and intelligence matters must be brought within the purview of this Security Intelligence Review Committee. After all, this review committee is supposed to assess the reliability of information that will be coming to the new agency from these other agencies and, more importantly—and this is something that the Senate committee alluded to in another connection—it is very important to make sure that the new CSIS does not hand off some activities to these other agencies in order to put those activities beyond the reach of the oversight and review procedures.

The second flaw which was referred to by Senator Gigantès is that the review committee will not be permitted to see relevant cabinet documents. It has no right to do that. Senator Gigantès has told us that this does not mean that the Cabinet, in its wisdom and goodness, will not allow them to see some documents if it judges that that is the way to go. However it would be, in the words of Oscar Wilde, a triumph of hope over experience to think that the Cabinet would really release documents of this kind to such a committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thought that was the definition of second marriage. I would not imagine that Oscar Wilde would say that.

Senator Murray: Nevertheless, I believe it was Oscar Wilde and it is a very apt description—

Senator Frith: I have no comment on that—

Senator Murray: It is a very apt description of Senator Gigantès' optimism as to the prospects of obtaining this kind of information from the government. If this review committee is to do its job; if it is to be one of the key safeguards, it must have access to relevant cabinet documents. What I am saying to honourable senators is that we are not talking about having access to cabinet documents that are not relevant to the work of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, but it will be very important to follow the "flow" from the advice that is given to the government in the first instance by the security agency, to the decision that is made by the government and the instructions that are given by the government to the security agency. These, I think, are of some considerable importance.

Again, efforts were made by the opposition in the other place to change these provisions, to give the Inspector General the tools he needs to do his job, to strengthen the mandate of the review committee in order to give them access to the information they need: All of these things have been voted down by the government majority in the other place.

The Progressive Conservative Party in the other place also proposed the establishment of a parliamentary oversight committee to review the administration and operations of Bill C-9 on a permanent basis. The need for such a committee of parliamentarians has been voiced by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association; by La Ligue des Droits et Libertés; by the Canadian Council of Churches. Once again, this was voted down by the government majority in the other place.

I say, therefore, that the bill is badly flawed and that the dangers that many people have always apprehended in the creation of a new civilian security agency are not put to rest by this bill. The McDonald commission acknowledged the apprehension of many people that such an agency would be susceptible to partisan motivations and to the direction of the political party in power. However, the McDonald commission sought to reassure us, and I quote from their second report, Volume 2 at page 762:

As we have argued several times in the Report, the need is to have a security intelligence simultaneously under the direction and control of government, but not used for partisan purposes. Our recommendations regarding the appointment and term of office of the Director General, the role of Parliament in the governance of the security intelligence function, and the establishment of an independent review body, all have been designed to provide safeguards against partisan abuse.

There, the McDonald commission is saying "Not to worry; look at all the safeguards we have recommended." But what has become of them? What about the Inspector General, the so-called eyes and ears of the minister? The eyes and ears are going to fly half blind and half deaf, forbidden to see relevant cabinet documents.

The Security Intelligence Review Committee—not allowed to see cabinet documents either; only authorized to monitor the new security agency and not the other government agencies that are also engaged in security and intelligence work. What about the parliamentary oversight committee, which was one of the central recommendations of the McDonald commission?—rejected outright by the government; voted down by a government majority in the other place.

This bill offers insufficient protection against abuse of power and position by the new agency and by its political masters. When I talk about abuse of power and position, I am not talking about some hypothetical danger posed by some extreme radical fringe group that gets into power by some accident at some distant date in the future. I am talking about extremist tendencies in the government that we have had in this country for the last 15 years; the tendency to treat adversaries of the Liberal Party and opponents of Liberal policies as if they were enemies of the state; a tendency that we have known only too well now for 15 years. Who has not seen the paranoia of some Liberal members and ministers, particularly those from the province of Quebec, whenever Radio Canada is mentioned; the search for separatists under every bed; the search for closet Péquistes in the public service? How quick they are to invoke national unity to rationalize any action or any abuse of position or power; how quick they are to accuse their opponents of fostering national disunity?

Some of us have long memories around here. I remember a time when Pierre Trudeau, stung by something he heard, started throwing "crypto-separatist" as a description of Robert Stanfield. The other day, Robert Kaplan, the Solicitor General of Canada, comes out of the House of Commons, just after this bill passed, and accuses the NDP of "parliamentary terrorism." How do you like that for a description? I say that when such phrases fall so readily from the lips of one of the chief law officers of the Crown, are we not justified in worrying about the kind of use or abuse that would be made by such a person or such a government of a Security Intelligence Agency—

Senator Frith: We will take that question as notice—

Senator Murray: The record of the government is replete with examples of abuse of position and power over the past few years. The Minister of State for Social Development is not here tonight, but he knows, perhaps better than anyone else in this house, the story of the 1976 Order in Council preventing access to information respecting the uranium cartel. Throughout much of 1977, the government denied that there was any such cover-up until the opposition obtained a copy of the Order in Council and put it on the table.

Hon. David Walker: Was he the minister at that time?

Senator Murray: I believe the Honourable Senator Austin was the deputy minister at that time.

● (2110)

Much of the issue advertising that is done by the Government of Canada with taxpayers' money is a blatant abuse of the government's power and position, and the latest examples of that are these magazines, copies of which I have in front of me, put out by something called the Canadian Unity Information Office, a Liberal propaganda plant in the middle of the public service, extolling Liberal MPs—

Senator Frith: Speaking of paranoia.

Senator Murray: —and their pictures.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: You are now into politics; what about the security service?

Senator Murray: I am talking about the abuse of power and position by this government. I am telling you why this government cannot be trusted with such a weapon as a security agency.

Senator Steuart: You are getting paranoid and talking about something dripping from the lips.

Senator Murray: I will send my honourable friend copies of the English version of some of these magazines that are being distributed by the Government of Canada in the province of Quebec.

Senator Steuart: Send the French version.

Senator Murray: I can tell him that they distribute magazines in Saskatchewan also, but those magazines do not contain pictures of the members of Parliament from Saskatchewan nor glowing write-ups on the members of Parliament from Saskatchewan.

It is all right to laugh about this, but this is an abuse of the taxpayers' money, an abuse of power and position. I do not think it will get them any more votes, but it certainly gives the political system a bad name.

Senator Steuart: What about the security agency?

Senator Murray: I am talking about the abuse of power and position on the part of this government.

Then there are people such as Robert Rabinovitch—whose name is at least known to the ministers sitting on the front bench—the Deputy Minister of Communications on the telephone calling Donald MacSween, the Director of the National Arts Centre, Tim Porteous, the Director of the Canada Council, Brian Anthony, the Director of the Canadian Conference of the Arts, telling those heads of supposedly independent agencies that the government will not tolerate criticism on their part of Bill C-24, and that at a time when a parliamentary committee was endeavouring to determine what the views of the heads of those so-called independent agencies were on that piece of legislation.

Senator Frith: We do not have Bill C-24 before us.

Senator Murray: It is before the other place. That is a bill dealing with crown corporations.

Senator Frith: Are you debating that now?

Senator Murray: I am debating the abuse of power and position on the part of the federal government.

Senator Frith: You are showing your paranoia.

Senator Murray: I used the name of Robert Rabinovitch because the name has been in the public domain over the past little while. That is just the latest example, but there are other Robert Rabinovitchs placed in key positions in the public service by a government intent on suborning the public service. That is where they are and that is what they are doing.

Senator Steuart: You should have given them your attention when you were in power for six months.

Senator Murray: The Robert Rabinovitchs are told to cail people such as MacSween, Porteous and Anthony and tell them that the government will not tolerate criticism of a bill, even when a parliamentary committee is trying to determine what the views of those people are.

Senator Walker: That is shocking.

Senator Murray: Of course it is shocking. Those people are there to do the bidding of their political masters. When you tax them with these activities they offer the classic defence: "We were only following orders". I say that in such an atmosphere of pressure and intimidation on the part of the government juggernaut, we are justified in demanding more and better safeguards in the operation of a new security intelligence agency. I know that some honourable senators will say that those are the bad old days I am talking about, that Mr. Trudeau is leaving now and that a new page will be turned with the advent of a new Liberal leader and Prime Minister.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It will be a blank page, I can guarantee you that.

Senator Murray: Before we turn the page I think we should take one look back.

Senator Frith: Going through life looking in a rear view mirror.

Senator Murray: I think we should take one more look back at that page, and the particular page to which I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators is page 34 of the Third Report of the McDonald commission.

Starting at page 34 and going on for a number of pages the McDonald commission recounts an incident which took place in December of 1970, a meeting attended by Prime Minister Trudeau, the Honourable John Turner, who was the then Minister of Justice, and Mr. Starnes, the then Director General of the security service. At that meeting Mr. Starnes told the gathering that the security service had been committing illegal acts for 20 years. Pierre Trudeau does not appear to have said very much about that when it came up, but what the notetakers recorded him as having said, he was later able to persuade the royal commissioners should have been attributed to somebody else, that he did not make those statements.

Mr. Turner, however, was not quite as fortunate because his reaction, when confronted with that statement by the head of—

Hon. Robert Muir: Which Turner?

Senator Murray: I am speaking of the Honourable John Turner, soon to be the Right Honourable John Turner. When confronted with this information about illegalities, his concern was for the image of the police and whether they were going to get caught. I will let the McDonald commission tell the story. At page 34, it states:

Our inquiry into the December 1st meeting of the C.C.P.P.—

That is the Cabinet Committee on Priorities and Policy:

—began when access was obtained by us to the minutes of the meeting and subsequently, in response to our request and upon the decision of Prime Minister Trudeau, we were given a copy of an extract of those minutes.

Indeed, as Senator Gigantès has pointed out, some of those things were made available to the McDonald royal commission, and perhaps we should take a pause for a moment to salute Mr. Trudeau for having shared those notes and records with the McDonald commission, knowing that they would reflect badly on a valued former colleague, the Honourable John Turner. I am sure it must have pained Mr. Trudeau to do that, almost as much as it pains me to have to recount it.

In any event, to return to the narrative of the McDonald commission, it goes on to state:

We were also given a copy of certain notes that had been made at the meeting by Mr. L. L. Trudel and Mr. M. E. Butler, then Assistant Secretaries to the Cabinet (these documents together form Exhibit VC-1). Mr. Trudel's notes are entitled "Police Operations page 5". The fourth page of those notes recorded the following discussion:

STARNES: misunderstanding of contradiction

—has been doing S & I illegal things for 20 years but never caught

—no way of escaping these things

TURNER: If you are caught . . .

then what of police image

Should you not be disassociated

STARNES: Can be done within RCMP—Has been. What do we do in these circumstances, guidelines.

There is much more. As I said that quotation begins on page 34 and goes on to the top of page 35. The story goes on for many pages. There is much more to it and much more nuance; there is a report on what various cabinet secretaries and officials said to the royal commission; there is a report on Mr. Trudeau's testimony before the commission; and there is a report on what Mr. Turner said about the meeting, and he could not recall anything about it.

In any case, the final word is to the McDonald commission. They state at page 64 the following:

We find that on December 1, 1970, Mr. Trudeau, Mr. Turner and other persons present were told that the Security Service had been doing illegal things for twenty years. We are satisfied that Mr. Trudel's handwritten notes record words used by Mr. Starnes at the meeting of December 1, 1970, namely that the Security Service had been doing illegal things for 20 years and had not been caught. We further find that those notes support the conclusion that the Honourable John Turner heard what Mr. Starnes said since he replied "If you are caught . . . then what of police image . . . should you not be dissociated"

I think that the most charitable thing that can be said about Mr. Turner's response to that situation as the chief law officer of the Crown in this country is that it was inadequate. Given his attitude, as revealed from these notes of this cabinet committee meeting, we should be no less apprehensive about possible abuses by the government of a new civilian security agency, and we should be no less convinced of the need for stronger safeguards and for more effective, independent review than is contained in this bill and for a parliamentary watchdog over the agency.

Finally, I think that the lack of adequate safeguards in this bill—in the review committee, the Inspector General and the lack of a parliamentary watchdog—makes more dubious the wisdom of separating the security service from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have sought over the past few months without success an answer to this question: What has been wrong with the security operations that could not be rectified by leaving the security service within the RCMP?—not that the RCMP is eager to keep the security service within the fold. On the contrary, many people who love the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and respect it and have been a part of it feel that their reputation has been damaged by the events of recent years and, most notably, by the lack of support on the part of the government for their servants. In any case, the arguments that have been put forward in support of removing the security service from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are not all that convincing. On the one hand they say the RCMP are somehow not qualified for this role, and in the next breath they tell you that 90 per cent of the RCMP now in the security service will be rolled into the new agency. On the one hand we are told that the RCMP are not accustomed to or trained for an intelligence gathering role and, yet, in co-operation with other police forces at home and abroad a very significant part of their investigative work in the drug trade, in commercial crime and so on, is one of intelligence gathering. We are told that special recruitment and special training are required for a security intelligence role. I do not know why that special recruitment and training could not be as well done within the RCMP as outside of it.

Against removing the security and intelligence function from the RCMP I believe that there are some strong arguments, namely, the fact that they have a proud tradition, an esprit de corps and an integrity that offers some added insurance against the abuse of the security forces for partisan political purposes, and the fact that the RCMP, including the security services, has an excellent working relationship with other police forces in Canada and with the security forces of allied countries. These arguments have added weight at a time when the government is proposing a new agency which is flawed in its concept due to inadequate provisions for supervision, insufficient external review and no real parliamentary overview.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald for Senator Kelly, debate adjourned.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-40, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

[Senator Murray.]

He said: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I participate in the debate on Bill C-40, to amend the Old Age Security Act. This is a very important piece of legislation which directly affects a large number of Canada's pensioners.

There are two major changes in Bill C-40. The first proposal is a $50 monthly increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement. The second proposal is to provide the same minimum income guarantee to persons receiving partial old age security pensions as that provided to persons receiving a full pension.

The Old Age Security Program is often described as the first tier of Canada's three-tiered retirement income system. Under this program all persons who meet the necessary age and residence requirements are provided with a basic old age security pension. This pension is an earned right, intended to provide a base to which income from other sources, such as the Canada Pension Plan and private arrangements, can be added.

There is another purpose to the Old Age Security Program, namely, to ensure that all pensioners are guaranteed a level of income sufficient to meet their basic living needs. This goal is to be met through the income-tested Guaranteed Income Supplement. The changes in the Guaranteed Income Supplement Program that are before us today are designed to meet that goal.

The first major change contained in the bill is a two-stage increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement benefit provided to low-income single pensioners and to one-pensioner couples. The increase will also be provided to widowed spouse's allowance recipients. Specifically, those pensioners will see the amount of their benefits increase by $50 in 1984—a $25 increase this July and a further $25 increase in December.

Approximately 750,000 current Guaranteed Income Supplement recipients will receive the full $50 increase. In addition, about 25,000 old age security pensioners will begin to receive a partial supplement. These are the pensioners who, without the $50 increase, have just enough income from other sources to make them ineligible for any supplement right now.

Providing an adequate retirement income to those single pensioners who rely heavily on the income provided through the Guaranteed Income Supplement Program is a goal many of us have always strongly supported. This support was shown in 1979 when the Guaranteed Income Supplement provided to single pensioners was increased by $20, and again in 1980 when each low-income pensioner-household received a $35 increase. These increases, $55 in total, were important and were of real benefit. However, they were not enough. Single pensioners who must depend almost entirely on the Old Age Security pension and Guaranteed Income Supplement to make ends meet, are still not guaranteed an income sufficient to meet their basic needs. This concern was raised when we debated the 1979 and 1980 increases.

The situation has been particularly bleak for single female pensioners. Many of these women spent the majority of their adult lives working outside the paid labour force and now find themselves alone. These women worked in their homes and communities doing jobs for which there was no pay cheque every week or every two weeks. As a result, they do not have personal pension protection from the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, or from employer-sponsored pension plans. These earnings-related retirement savings vehicles are available, at best, only to members of the paid labour force.

While some of these women are receiving survivors' benefits based on their deceased husbands' pension entitlements, a majority of single elderly women rely on the Old Age Security program for a high proportion of their total retirement income. In fact, almost 32 per cent of current single GIS pensioners receive the maximum supplement. For these 235,000 pensioners, the basic Old Age Security pension and the income-tested Guaranteed Income Supplement are the only income they have, unless they live in a province which provides an additional "top-up" benefit.

Virtually everyone who was involved in the pension reform process over the last few years supported an increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement for single pensioners. They recognized that this vulnerable group should have access to an adequate level of retirement income, but not many could define what "adequate" was.

We had no such problem. Thanks to the efforts of the Honourable David Croll and his committee, which released the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in 1971, we have known the definition of "adequate" for years. Even back then, this chamber pointed out that single persons need at least 60 per cent of the income of a couple to maintain the same standard of living. It took a long time, but the other place finally listened. As the combined OAS-GIS level provided to two-pensioner couples is already considered sufficient, it was decided that the GIS single rate must be increased to equal at least 60 per cent of the income guaranteed to couples.

That goal will be reached—in fact, it will be exceeded—if honourable senators give approval to the proposed $50 increase which will be made in addition to the regular, quarterly cost-of-living increases. By December of this year, single low-income pensioners will be guaranteed 62 per cent of the income guaranteed to two-pensioner couples.

This fiscal year, the $50 increase will raise program expenditures by $250 million. In 1985-86, estimated additional costs are $460 million. I think you will agree with me when I say that this will be money well spent.

As honourable senators may be aware, the report of the Task Force on Pension Reform, made up of members of the other place, proposed a $102-per-month increase for single Guaranteed Income Supplement recipients. I want to take a moment to explain why this proposal was not accepted. Specifically, the task force proposed to add a special top-up of $102 to the current Guaranteed Income Supplement benefit, which would then be taxed back at 100 per cent. Thus, for every $1 of income a pensioner receives from other sources, the top-up would be reduced by $1. Certainly, the income provided to those single pensioners who currently receive a maximum Guaranteed Income Supplement would have been greater than with the $50 increase proposed in this bill. However, it would have done absolutely nothing for most partial single GIS recipients.

As well, I would remind honourable senators that the income test currently used to determine eligibility for the Guaranteed Income Supplement was designed to encourage pensioners to make personal provision for their retirement. For every $2 of personal income a pensioner has, the supplement is reduced by only $1. The dollar-for-dollar reduction that the task force proposed would certainly not encourage personal initiative, especially by those who can only make modest provision for their retirement.

I would now like to address the other major amendment contained in Bill C-40. This proposal will ensure that anyone in Canada receiving a partial Old Age Security pension will have the same income guarantees as those provided to full pensioners. Specifically, a partial pensioner with no other source of income will receive a Guaranteed Income Supplement equal to the amount needed to give him or her the same total income provided to a full pensioner through the OAS-GIS program.

For partial pensioners who have some other source of income, the amount of their Guaranteed Income Supplement will, of course, be diminished by $1 for every $2 of additional income they have.

As honourable senators may recall, prior to 1977, eligibility for a basic Old Age Security pension was determined on the basis of some rather complex residence rules. Those residence rules were unfair because, one, they treated the same length of residence in Canada differently depending on when it occurred; and, two, an individual either qualified for a full basic benefit or for none at all.

As a result, the Old Age Security Act was amended in 1977 to provide for the payment of partial pensions to persons with at least 10 years, but less than 40 years of residence in Canada. As a result, the basic OAS pension is now earned at the rate of one-fortieth of the full benefit for each year spent in Canada after age 18.

At the same time, the act was amended to enable the federal government to include Old Age Security benefits in international social security agreements. These agreements allow immigrants to bring to Canada the pension rights they have earned in other countries. Such rights can then be combined with rights earned here to meet eligibility rules for Canadian benefits, such as the 10-year requirement for OAS. Currently, agreements are in force with five countries: Italy, France, Portugal, Greece and Jamaica. An agreement with the United States is expected to come into force this August. In addition, an agreement with Belgium has recently been signed and it is hoped that it will be effective by mid-1985. Negotiations are also under way with a number of other countries.

It was hoped that persons who qualified for partial benefits would, because of the years they spent in another country, also be receiving social security benefits from that other country. This is happening and has been greatly facilitated by the international social security agreements Canada has already negotiated. Nevertheless, there are those partial OAS pensioners who are not receiving any other income. In short, they are guaranteed less, in total, under the OAS-GIS program than persons who have always lived in Canada.

Honourable senators, Bill C-40 will eliminate this inequity. It will guarantee low-income recipients of partial OAS pensions the same minimum level of income as other pensioners. It will provide additional GIS to fill the gap between the partial and full OAS benefit levels. About 3,000 persons, primarily immigrants, will be helped by this amendment in the first year; by 1990-91, it is estimated that as many as 25,000 will benefit.

While the changes in the Guaranteed Income Supplement for single pensioners and for partial pensioners are the most important aspects of this bill, it also contains a number of miscellaneous and technical amendments. These amendments are designed to make the Old Age Security program more responsive to pensioners' needs. For example, the bill proposes to extend the retroactivity period for receipt of a basic OAS pension to five years, from the current one year. As I mentioned earlier, the pension is a right which is earned based on years of residence in Canada. Therefore, we want to ensure that the very small number of pensioners who fail to make application within 12 months of their eligibility date are not forfeiting benefits which they have earned.

Another proposal which is very important, even though it may not affect a large number of pensioners, concerns the time frame for granting "single status" to an Old Age Security pensioner whose marriage breaks down. Currently, an individual can only be considered single one year after the end of the fiscal year in which separation occurs. Thus, the waiting period for entitlement to GIS at the single rate can range from one to two years. This can cause severe hardship in cases where most of the couple's income is paid to one spouse. The spouse with little or no income must get along on a supplement that is calculated on a level of income which he or she simply does not have. This is unacceptable.

While I do believe that a reasonable waiting period is justifiable, I believe it should be shorter and should be the same for all spouses, regardless of when in the year they separate. For this reason the proposal contained in Bill C-40 will shorten the waiting period to six months following the month of separation.

Several other amendments are proposed in an effort to make the old age security program more equitable and efficient. Included are provisions allowing for post-mortem application; compensating pensioners who lose any benefit entitlement as a result of administrative error or erroneous advice; authorizing, where necessary, the issuing of a certificate on presumption of death; repealing an unnecessary and potentially misleading provision dealing with benefit entitlement under international social security agreements; and, finally, the changes necessary to co-ordinate Canada Pension Plan benefits with other sources of pension income for Guaranteed Income Supplement entitlement purposes. More details on these amendments are included in the information package which has already been provided to honourable senators.

Honourable senators, this is an important piece of legislation. There has been a constructive debate in this country for many years about the best way to build better pensions for Canadians. Bill C-40 is the first step in that building process. It recognizes that our first priority must be to provide help for today's pensioners—the ones who stand to gain little, if anything, from reform of other aspects of the pension system.

The changes contained in this bill are only the beginning. Work is also under way to obtain agreement with the provinces on a wide range of changes to the Canada Pension Plan and the Pension Benefits Standards Act. As well, the private sector is being consulted on the proposed changes in the tax assistance provided to assist individual Canadians to save for retirement.

As I am sure all senators will agree, only by improving the vehicles available to Canadians to plan for their retirement will we eventually be able to reduce the role of the Guaranteed Income Supplement program. It is my fervent hope that, in the long run, measures to increase income-tested benefits will not be necessary—measures which, after all, reflect the failure of other pension vehicles to perform as they should. The federal government must take the lead in legislating pension reform, just as it took the lead in the long period of study and consultation that preceded today.

Honourable senators, these are the main features of this legislation. There will be an opportunity to discuss it in greater detail when it is referred to committee. It is my understanding that that will take place after the opposition has made its views known on second reading. Thank you.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-37, to amend the National Housing Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-37 is of particular interest to two important groups of Canadians: first, mortgagors—particularly those who fear rises in interest rates on the renewal of their mortgages—and, secondly, the native peoples, since the bill will improve and make available for the first time throughout Canada provisions of the Rural and Native Housing Program.

With reference to mortgage financing, honourable senators will recall that interest rates have not fluctuated a great deal over the last while. Although they may change, they do not change as dramatically as they did in 1981, for example, when they exceeded 20 per cent.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Keep your fingers crossed!

Senator Frith: Yes, we will all do that.

Honourable senators, that rise in interest rates, of course, had a marked effect on the attitude towards borrowing, with the expected ripple effect throughout the economy. People were worried about interest rates—people could not get long-term financing—and naturally hesitated to buy houses. Because of that hesitation, the construction industry was seriously affected and that is the ripple effect to which I refer.

This Mortgage Rate Protection Program is intended to help restore confidence in the housing market and to allow home owners to plan their expenditures a few years in advance, with some assurance that their expectations will be fulfilled. What this MRPP, as it is called, does is protect home owners against unexpected and ruinous increases in mortgage interest rates. The fee for this protection is 1.5 per cent of the value of the mortgage. Mortgages with a value of up to $70,000 will be covered. The protection applies only to first mortgages. Claims will be paid to cover some of the additional costs arising from increased mortgage rates at the time of renewal. No claim will be paid for the first two percentage points of the increase—which is similar to the deductible clause in an insurance policy—after which the program will pay for 75 per cent of the increased costs, up to an additional 10 percentage points.

In effect, honourable senators, this is an insurance policy. The term of it will match the term of the mortgage. In other words, if it is a one-year mortgage, for a fee one can buy this insurance for a renewal of one year. If it is a five-year mortgage, the term for the renewal will be one of five years. In effect, then, if a mortgagor takes out a five-year mortgage he will get ten years of protection, because the first five years is covered by the mortgage itself in which the interest rate is set, and the protection for that insurance portion would continue for another five years.

As to the other features of the bill, first, it is a voluntary program. No one will be compelled to participate in it. The provisions are quite straightforward, I believe, and home owners will be able to decide for themselves, in the light of their own financial circumstances, whether it will be of benefit to them. We can imagine that it will benefit a great many people, particularly young married couples and first home owners. In many cases, such young people have to strain their financial resources to find the downpayment. They are probably making some sacrifices to meet their monthly payments of principal, interest and taxes. Picture such people with a three-year mortgage, stretching all of their finances in order to be able to own their first home, when it comes to renewal time and they face an increase of five, six or seven percentage points. That could make all the difference, resulting in the loss of their home.

There will, of course, be those people who can withstand an increase of four or five percentage points over five years who might decide that this is not a program for them, that they do not wish to pay the fee to have that protection. It is a matter of choice, therefore, and everyone is free to decide whether he needs the program's protection. It is not a way of protecting all homeowners against all increases in mortgage interest rates. It is a way of heading off unexpected and unmanageable changes. In effect, it is a cushion.

With regard to the first two percentage points, of course, the homeowner is sharing with the government the risk of increased rates through the 2 per cent deductible and other features. It is hoped that it will encourage shopping among lenders for the most beneficial rates, and thus preserve competitiveness in the mortgage market. This is an important element in the government's overall strategy for economic recovery and the restoration of financial stability.

There are two other aspects that should be highlighted. With reference to mortgage protection, there is an added feature of mortgage-backed securities. The third and last element is the rural and native homeowner feature that I mentioned at the outset.

Dealing with the second part—that is, mortgage-backed securities—honourable senators may be aware that such securities have been available in the United States for several years, and they have had a beneficial effect on the U.S. mortgage market. They have brought into the market long-term investors such as insurance companies and pension funds which previously had shown little interest in mortgages as an investment. More importantly, mortgage-backed securities have had the effect in the United States of extending mortgages in some cases to terms of 20 or 30 years. At the moment, as honourable senators will probably know, five years is virtually the maximum term available in Canada. To the extent that the term can be extended—and we shall have to see whether the program does that—it would allow homeowners to develop their financial plans with a greater sense of security.

Mortgage-backed securities would also have the effect, as they have had in the U.S., of making mortgages more attractive to the individual investor. As honourable senators know, they can be sold like bonds and give investors more flexibility and liquidity in managing their portfolios, because as honourable senators who as mortgagees have held mortgages will know, they can, of course, be assigned, but there is not a market for them as there is for normal investments. Therefore these mortgage-backed securities would have that flexibility.

As to how it works, the financial institutions would have a pool of mortgages and use them as backing for securities. The securities would then be sold to investors. The investors would receive each month their share of principal and interest payments on the mortgages less the servicing fee paid to the institution issuing the securities. The proceeds from the sale of the securities would then be invested in new mortgages having the same term as the securities—perhaps even 10 years.

The government's role in the system, and the reason for this bill, is that it would provide insurance guaranteeing that payments would be made in a timely fashion to the holders of the securities—that is, the securities issued by the institution backed by the pool of mortgages. Those guarantees would be financed by premiums on a self-sustaining basis, and like the mortgage rate protection program, which is virtually an insurance program, would not involve any public subsidies. There are no public subsidies either in the mortgage backed plan or in the mortgage protection plan.

Senator Roblin: There could possibly be a subsidy element there—a large one.

Senator Frith: There is a risk, definitely.

Senator Roblin: You said there would be no subsidy. But there will be.

Senator Frith: It depends on which word you wish to use. There are risks. It is hoped that in the long run there will be neither a loss nor a profit. To make up any loss, and to suffer the risk, you might wish to call it a subsidy. But the point is that the fee is meant to finance the program. I say it is not a subsidy although the honourable senator says it is. It is not a subsidy program. It is a self-financing program, and the subsidy, if the honourable senator wishes to call it that, can only come if there is a loss in the scheme. But it is hoped there will not be.

MRPP and the system of mortgage-backed securities will not in themselves solve all of the homeowners' problems, but they do represent an important element in the government's strategy to enhance the financial security of all Canadians.

The third aspect of the bill is the rural and native housing. This is really in a different category from the two I have just mentioned. There are many individuals and families—people of native ancestry—who live in the rural and more remote parts of this country, and because of geography, historical and cultural circumstances have housing problems that are different in nature, and of a degree of severity different from that of most people living in cities and large towns. The government for many years has been conscious of their special needs and approximately 10 years ago introduced the program called the Rural and Native Housing Program.

Honourable senators will recall that under that program people living in rural areas and communities of 2,500 population or less were offered forgivable loans to help restore houses to acceptable standards of health and safety, and there were special grants for emergency repairs. It also provided assistance to enable people to acquire their own homes by subsidizing mortgage payments and taxes, and assisting with the cost of utilities. There is some assistance for rented housing, but rentals do not represent a large proportion of the housing stock in rural areas.

With the exception of the home ownership assistance and a limited assistance for rentals, all elements of the program are funded solely by the federal government. Under the terms of the National Housing Act, the home ownership and rental assistance must be cost shared with the provinces.

Why are we introducing this program, when a program was fully set up previously? The problem is that some provinces had participated in the program but have withdrawn, and others had never participated in the program, as in the case of Quebec. The program has been reviewed with the assistance of native organizations, and the government believes that it must become more efficient and effective if it is going to catch up with the backlog of need. Therefore a number of improvements have been introduced which do not require legislative change.

The most serious limitation on the program is the requirement that home ownership assistance must involve provincial participation. As I have mentioned, that participation has not been consistent. Prince Edward Island has not contributed to the program since 1977, and New Brunswick since 1983. British Columbia withdrew this year, and Quebec has never participated. The effect of these withdrawals or abstentions has been that the people in those provinces, who would otherwise have been entitled to all of the program's benefits, have been denied help in acquiring their own homes or in renting suitable accommodation. Also, some of the provinces, while participating, have attached terms and conditions to their contributions which, in many cases, are at odds with the aims and objectives of the program.

The third feature of this bill is to remove from the National Housing Act the requirement for provincial participation and to allow the federal government to fund all aspects of the Rural and Native Housing Program; also to see that all of the benefits are delivered to all of those people who, as Canadians, are entitled to receive them. In doing so, the government will seek the co-operation and financial participation of provinces, but it will not be a condition.

An added feature to this aspect of the bill will allow Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to enhance the assistance available to people in the designated areas who are acquiring their own homes. It would permit CMHC to make additional payments to cover heating costs which, in some remote areas, actually exceed monthly mortgage payments.

So the effect overall, honourable senators, is that in different ways this legislation will assist Canadians in all parts of the country to cope with pressing housing problems. For those homeowners and prospective homeowners who are anxious about their ability to cope with unpredictable mortgage interest rates, it offers a self-help protection plan to extend their planning horizons and to increase confidence in the housing market. For people in rural areas, and particularly people of native ancestry, it ensures that they will benefit from the full range of assistance available to deal with their special housing problems and needs.

The three main subjects to which I have referred are dealt with in the bill. The first is dealt with in the first two clauses, the second in the next ten clauses and the third in the balance of the bill. I am sure honourable senators are aware that there are high hopes that the benefits of this legislation will be enacted into law during this session of Parliament, so I commend it to your earnest consideration.

Senator Roblin: Before the debate is adjourned, I seek the assurance that when this bill goes to committee tomorrow afternoon, as I expect it will, there will be present officials or other knowledgeable people who can deal with the budgetary and financial aspects, including the element of subsidy that is foreseen and the numbers of people who are affected by this bill. I think it would be helpful in concentrating our minds as to the meaning of this bill to have some of the figures involved in it before us. In view of the pressures of time that we are feeling, I think it wise to give my friend notice that I hope to ask those questions at the committee meeting tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have quite a bit of that information here and can answer some of the questions now. I have some material with reference to its application to the provinces but that information can also be obtained in committee. Of course, I have no objection to the bill going to committee.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the debate, would the sponsor explain the proposed section 34.89 and subclauses 13(a) and (b), which deal with the financing and appropriation of funds.

Senator Frith: Clause 13 deals with amendments to subsection 55(7) of the act and provides the minister with statutory financial authority for advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the purpose of housing carried out in designated areas in relation to the rural and native housing program. The limit on such advances of $400 million is stipulated by the proposed new subsection 55(8) together with any additional amounts appropriated by Parliament.

Incidentally, I can also table for tomorrow or add to the information the profile on the estimated distribution of mortgage borrowers by provinces.

Senator Roblin: I think it would be preferable if we were to get that information in committee.

Senator Frith: On the other part of Senator Phillips' question, I shall have to get the answer for tomorrow or see that it is available for the committee.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

CONSIDERATION OF INTERIM REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have the honour of tabling the interim report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, entitled: "Rail Passenger Services in Canada—Are we on the right track?".

I ask that the interim report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix, p. 803.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration forthwith.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to table the interim report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, entitled: "Rail Passenger Services in Canada—Are we on the right track?".

As the title indicates, the committee is concerned about the present, and especially the future state of passenger rail service in Canada. The committee acknowledges that progress has been made since its first interim report was published in July 1982, and lists the items that should be taken care of immediately if we want to provide this country with an efficient passenger rail network.

The committee formulated twenty-six recommendations on a number of critical points. The report stresses the need to grant VIA Rail the powers it needs to discharge its responsibility for providing a passenger rail service.

The committee recommends adopting legislation that will define the responsibilities and powers of VIA Rail and the government. Only by adopting special legislation can we give VIA Rail Canada the requisite mandate for establishing and maintaining a viable and efficient national network of passenger rail services.

The committee also considered the matter of operating contracts and costing procedures of railway companies; subsidies and passenger services; marketing methods; joint VIA-Amtrack services; and the possibility of restoring passenger rail services on certain routes. Contracts and arrangements entered into by VIA Rail with the railway companies on establishing costs have been criticized for some time, and the committee recommends that these be changed.

Specifically, your committee recommends that VIA Rail have access to all information held by railway companies on establishing costs; that VIA Rail be entitled to negotiate operating contracts directly with the railway companies, bearing in mind costs that can be avoided in the short term, as well as the right to appeal to the Canadian Transport Commission, should the parties be unable to reach an agreement.

Regarding service improvements, we are asking for the revitalization of VIA Rail's obsolete rolling stock, priority for passenger trains over freight trains, employee participation in the VIA Rail revitalization program, updated ticket reservation and marketing systems and a comprehensive plan to be developed by VIA Rail for improving all inter-city passenger rail services.

The committee raised again an important matter mentioned in its July 1982 report, namely, the need for restoring passenger services discontinued by the government.

Once again, we expressed our disapproval of the fact that routes were discontinued by Order in Council instead of through public hearings before the CTC. We urgently request that the federal government reconsider its decision to reduce passenger services. We particularly recommend restoring forthwith the "Atlantic" train route from Montreal to Halifax via southern New Brunswick.

Finally, the committee is of the opinion that the federal government should define as soon as possible its commitment to passenger rail service in Canada. Legislation should give VIA Rail the powers it needs to discharge its responsibilities. It is our conviction that passenger rail service will be put on the right track if the committee's recommendations, including the adoption of legislation, are implemented without delay. Action must be taken now—the future of VIA Rail is at stake!

I would like to express sincere thanks to my honourable colleagues on the committee, to the clerk of the committee, Mr. André Reny, and to the committee's researcher, Mr. John Christopher, for their unremitting efforts and constant co-operation.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Special Senate Committee on Youth have power to sit today while the Senate is sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I mentioned yesterday, the Special Committee on Youth had a meeting scheduled today for ten o'clock. The committee will have to continue its meeting this afternoon, and that is why I am asking for leave to allow the committee to sit today while the Senate is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA DAY

DATE OF PUBLIC HOLIDAY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Honourable senators may recall that in the fall of 1982, a bill to amend certain acts in relation to Canada Day was presented and passed in the Senate but subsequently died on the order paper of the House of Commons. The bill provided that when Canada Day fell on a Sunday, the following day should be a holiday.

The leader may also recall that previously I tried to amend Bill C-201, a private bill that had come from the other place to change the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day. The purpose of my amendment was to provide a solution to the problem we face when Canada Day falls on a Sunday. The government leadership opposed my amendment. Then the government introduced a bill with my amendment in it, but the bill died on the order paper of the House of Commons.

I am wondering if next Monday will be a holiday, and, if it is, how the government will proceed.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take the question as notice and attempt to provide the Leader of the Opposition with the details very shortly, possibly tomorrow or the next day, but whether it is a statutory provision or not, I believe—

Senator Flynn: It is not.

Senator Olson: You say it is not. If it is not, I think there would be widespread use of Monday as a holiday from work, although the actual celebration of Canada Day and some of the official functions that will take place will probably be held on July 1. As I said, I shall attempt to provide the Leader of the Opposition with that detail either tomorrow or the next day.

THE SENATE

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I can remember in my younger days being in court with a pair of grey trousers under my gown and the judge saying that he could not see me. I thought that perhaps he was going blind. I am wondering today whether I can see the Speaker pro tempore. I wonder if he is properly and conventionally robed to sit in the Chair.

I am not sure, Your Honour, whether I can see you.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I can assure the Honourable Senator Lang that I am in fact here. I am temporarily replacing His Honour the Speaker who had to leave the Chair for a moment. He will return shortly and will be properly gowned.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it should be noted that the Speaker of the Senate did open today's sitting. Senator Molgat is replacing him in essence under the new rule and the long-standing rule 9. Senator Lang has probably noticed that when it is a continuation of an absence of the Speaker and Speaker pro tempore opens the sitting, he is robed in a way that is more visible.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EFFORTS TO REUNITE FAMILIES OF POLISH IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to preface my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate by saying that after some negotiations we have been able to get the Ambassador of Poland to meet at noon today with interested senators and members of the House of Commons, in particular the members of the Polish Emergency Committee and the Helsinki Agreement Monitoring Group of Canadian Parliamentarians, on the urgent matter of the reunification of families of three Canadian residents now in the 35th day of their hunger strike in front of the Polish consulate in Toronto.

Would the leader give us an up-to-date report on the efforts of the Canadian government in this matter? Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs meet without delay in person with the Polish Ambassador to convey our concern regarding the state of the health of those hunger strikers and the need to expedite the issuing of exit visas for their families in Poland?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall refer that question to the Department of

ITEMS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, there are three orders now standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Frith which result from motions I put some time ago. In fact, they were on the Order Paper during the last session of Parliament. When I spoke to them I asked the Deputy Leader of the Government to take some action on them.

The first one was the motion where we approved, as a general principle, that where there was a bill in which a province had a particular interest, as a matter of policy the provincial government should be asked whether or not they wished to make representations in committee.

The second one was whether we give power to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to examine bills in order to determine whether or not there was possibly an infringement of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and, if so, to draw it to the attention of the committee dealing with the bill.

The third one was with respect to enabling clauses to make regulations which were unnecessarily wide and where they did not follow a direction approved by Cabinet—that that matter should be drawn to the attention of the committee.

My question is: Are these going to be allowed to die again on the Order Paper, or is Senator Frith going to speak to them before the end of the session?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the first one, I mentioned to Senator Godfrey that I wanted to get the views of the chairmen of committees before speaking to it, and it has been discussed by them. Before the end of the session I want to speak to that matter explaining what I believe is the correct way to deal with it.

With regard to the human rights aspect, I am hoping to have something to say about that after conferring with the authorities who are interested and with the Cabinet.

On the third one, which is not as long standing as the other two, immediately after it was raised I asked for a response, particularly from the Department of Agriculture which, I think, among others inspired that concern, but I have not yet received a reply.

Senator Godfrey: As a supplementary question, does the deputy leader really believe that he should consult the Cabinet and receive directions from it on how the Senate should conduct its own business? The second item, which refers to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, strictly relates to how the Senate conducts its business, and we should make that decision and not the Cabinet.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are just waking up.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It has been going on for years.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Frith: The answer to each of the two questions is yes and no respectively. Yes, I believe that among the people I should consult are those in the Cabinet. But should I consult them in order to get their instructions? No.

Senator Godfrey: Good.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is a fair answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray: They can instruct you but they cannot instruct the Senate.

Senator Frith: I don't ask them for instructions.

Senator Murray: You don't have to.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Roblin inquired as to whether I had received a report of the Canada Grains Council on a study entitled "Churchill as an Outlet for Prairie Grain." I told him that I did not have it at hand but I would check on this matter. Upon checking this morning, I found that the report arrived at the Grains Group office yesterday and another report arrived at the administration office this morning. Perhaps Senator Roblin has his own copy of the report, but, if necessary, I would be pleased to hand over to him one of the two copies that I received. I have not had an opportunity to study the report or to have it studied, but it appears to be rather neutral as far as Churchill is concerned, and is mainly a report containing a great deal of information. I certainly shall have it studied and see if I can respond to the request made by Senator Roblin.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the report was in the public domain on June 14, which is a little less than two weeks ago, so either they are rather neglectful of my honourable friend's interest in the matter or else the Post Office is doing its usual good job of getting the mail from one part of the country to the other.

Senator Argue: It arrived yesterday at the Grains Group office for the first time and in my office for the first time this morning.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the information but, as I say, the report has been around for some time and I will await with interest what he has to say about it because there are a lot of people in the west who have a real interest in the government's reaction.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): June 14 was the first day of the Liberal convention.

Senator Argue: It is more rapid, then.

PORT OF CHURCHILL—DATE OF OPENING

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. There are rumours circulating in the province of Manitoba that the port of Churchill will be opened early this year. Is it the intention of the Canadian Wheat Board to capitalize on that and make better use of the port of Churchill?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): The Wheat Board's attitude is that it uses the port of Churchill to the optimum extent, balancing the availability of ships coming into the port and the financial returns. Very often there are extra financial returns in Churchill as a result of using the facilities.

I am not certain what the level of shipments will be this year. I can only say that the Canadian Wheat Board will be using the Churchill port extensively.

Senator Guay: Is there good communication between the Canadian Wheat Board and the railroad to ensure that this year the track will be in good shape so that extensive use can be made of the port?

It is my impression that there is always a delay in this regard. I feel there should be good communication between the railroads and the Canadian Wheat Board to ensure that everything is in order and ready so that more grain can be shipped through Churchill.

Senator Argue: Last year we used the port of Churchill to the extent of about 600,000 tonnes, which is on the higher side rather than on the lower side. The Minister of Transport, in an announcement some time ago, committed very large sums of money to upgrading the port and the railway facilities to ensure that communication is not a problem. I think Senator Guay can rest assured that the Canadian Wheat Board will be making extensive use of the port.

PORT OF CHURCHILL—PROVISION OF RAILWAY BOX CARS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board give us a report on the activities of the government respecting the provision of box cars for the Churchill run? As my honourable friend knows, that line can only use box cars; it cannot use the grain hopper cars that are generally employed in the transportation system.

I am told that we are losing box cars at the rate of 2.7 per day and that the 3,000 now in service will be out of service within a couple of years. A major decision will have to be made—involving costs amounting, I suspect, to something between $40 million and $60 million—as to whether the box car system is to be kept alive so that this port can be kept alive.

That underlines the urgency of my request for information to the minister as to what is to be done about Churchill because, regardless of the long-term situation which that port might face, it has an emergency situation, I suggest, with respect to the provision of box cars over the next few years if the port is to continue to be used as it is now for the movement of grain.

Would my honourable friend give us some indication of that situation so we may know where we are heading?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, my information, in general terms, is that there are box cars available in adequate numbers at the present time. Box cars are rehabilitated; they are not all discarded as time goes on.

A good deal of research work is being done to try to develop a particularly light-weight hopper car that might be useful on the railway to Churchill. If those in charge can develop a light-weight hopper car suitable to the permafrost conditions on that railroad, I think that would probably be the preferable vehicle to use.

I notice that a good deal of time has been taken and every effort has been made to study the box car situation in this particular report. I shall endeavour to cover that subject more thoroughly when I make a fuller statement on the report itself.

Senator Roblin: I would remind my honourable friend that the report indicates that the present box car supply will be dissipated in three years' time unless something is done. Three years is not a long period of time.

I agree with my honourable friend that, if the lighter-weight hopper car can be developed it may be a good idea to utilize it on this run, but I would point out that so far I have had no indication—and if I am wrong, I stand to be corrected—that anything substantive is being done about this except to talk about it. I would like to have a fuller statement on this question of box cars or light-weight hopper cars for Churchill. If that can be provided before we rise, it will be useful.

Senator Argue: I do not know how long it will take to prepare that kind of analysis, but I will endeavour to have it done in the time suggested by Senator Roblin. I think, however, that I can give to him and to Senator Guay the general assurance that the policy of the government is to continue to use to the optimum the port of Churchill, bearing in mind that the use of that port should be in the interests of the grain producers themselves. To the extent that that can be done, I believe it will and should be done. I can give the further assurance that the railway fleet will be maintained so that this optimum use of the port can be continued in the future.

In my view, the Minister of Transport has shown his dedication to the port of Churchill by working with the Government of Manitoba to come forward with a joint transportation policy that has embodied in it the maintaining for the future the viability of that port, particularly for the exporters of grain.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is precisely the point raised in this report; namely, its effect on the grain producers in terms of whether or not it is a drain on their resources. The report does not make recommendations on this matter but does produce a fascinating set of observations, which, I take it, are facts that can be substantiated and that lend some credence to the proposition that this Churchill situation may be a particularly questionable one or one which is difficult to decide upon at the present time.

Therefore, while the minister says that he is going to carry on in the way he is doing at present, and when he adds to that statement "so long as it benefits the western grain producers"—which is what I think he said—then the whole question developed in this report becomes pertinent. I emphasize to my honourable friend, therefore, that I await with some interest his more considered reaction.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have a little difficulty with this line of questioning because, in the past, I have understood Senator Roblin to be a supporter of the port of Churchill. He now appears to raise a great many questions—founded, perhaps, on statements in this report—as to whether or not the use of that port is really in the interests of the grain producers. I do not take that position. I take the position that the use of the port of Churchill is in the interests of the grain producers. I believe that the Wheat Board uses it in a way that increases the net return to the grain producers, so I am not raising that particular doubt.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well, you were.

Senator Argue: That doubt may be in the mind of Senator Roblin, but I believe that the port of Churchill is in the interests of the grain producers. What I had said was that the Wheat Board is dedicated to using the port to the optimum in terms of the quantity of exports that bring an increased return to the producers.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is really not entitled to impute to me any statement about policy with respect to the port of Churchill. I have not made any such statement. I have said to him that certain facts have been presented with respect to that port and I would like to know what the government policy is in respect of them. I am not making policy in this chamber but my honourable friend is, and I would like to know from him what the policy is going to be. If the policy—and he can substantiate it—is one that enhances the port of Churchill, no one will be more satisfied about it than I. The questions raised here, however, require a policy statement on the part of the government as to its idea of what the future of that port should be.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I suppose that I have misunderstood the honourable senator in the past. I understood from the statements he was making that it was the policy of the Progressive Conservative Party to support the port of Churchill. I am not saying whether it is or not. As far as I am concerned, the policy of the government is to support that port.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has absolutely no ground whatsoever for that statement. He knows perfectly well that I do not make policy statements for the Progressive Conservative Party. Certainly he knows that I have made none on behalf of that party with reference to the port of Churchill. My own record on Churchill is clear. As to the imputation my honourable friend wishes to accord statements I have made, I say that he is completely off base.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Is that true, as well, for the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate? Does he also not make any statements on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Flynn: On occasion I do, but when I do you can understand what I say.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE BILL

SECOND READING

• (1130)

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand, for the second reading of Bill C-9 intituled: "An Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact An Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator Kelly).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise before you today with some hesitation. The truth of the matter is that although my conscience and sense of duty urge me to address Bill C-9, I had hoped that the bill would not reach this chamber. However, I am pleased for a number of reasons to be a member of the Senate, and my main source of pleasure is due to the nature of this chamber. The Senate is the last hurdle for legislation. It is the place for the last word. I stand before you to accept the responsibility of being part of that last barrier.

Honourable senators, my thoughts and anxieties about this piece of legislation are a matter of public record. As a member of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, I was vocal in my opposition to the separation of security intelligence work from our national police force, the RCMP. I also addressed this critical issue, an aspect of Bill C-9, before a group of Ontario's opinion leaders at a luncheon of the Canadian Club on April 30. Many of the 1,400 people who attended that luncheon have joined the growing group of concerned Canadians who view this bill as potentially dangerous to our civil liberties and to our concept of law and order.

In my opinion—again I am not alone in this—Bill C-9 clearly moves in the direction of a CIA for Canada. I want us to think about that. I want us to consider the serious consequences of that for Canada before we vote. Before we, as senators, exercise our duty and responsibility on Bill C-9, I want us to think about the criticism of some of the provincial attorneys general who have been unanimous in their opposition to a separate civilian agency.

Honourable senators, the provincial attorneys general believe that security should be left to the RCMP. How can we not consider the specific warning of our country's top law officers?

Honourable senators, I did not address the members and guests of the Canadian Club as a member of the Progressive Conservative Party. Nor do I rise before you now to discuss this bill in a partisan way. I believe this issue is of such vital importance to the people of Canada—to you, to me, to present and future generations—that it cannot be dealt with as an issue of narrow partisanship. I sincerely hope that before I finish outlining my concerns, many, if not all of you, will agree with me on this point and will vote in accordance with your conscience, and not as your political affiliation would direct you.

Walter Bagehot, author of the book The English Constitution wrote as follows:

A member of Parliament has not only to pay much to become one and to give time and labour. He also has to sacrifice his mind too—at least all of the characteristic part of it, that which is original and most his own.

I hope to appeal to this part of the minds of honourable senators. In considering Bill C-9, I will address two main points: first, the public punishment and potential undermining of the RCMP for events that took place over a decade ago; and, secondly, the pros and cons of a separate civilian agency as opposed to retaining this responsibility in the hands of a trained, well established and internationally respected force.

Again I stress the word "separate", because that is the core of the issue. My first point rests on an unfair, mostly unstated, but nonetheless widespread sentiment that the government's proposal to remove the responsibility for security and intelligence from the RCMP is a form of public reprimand, that it is a punishment, a punishment of the RCMP for the actions of a dozen or so members of the force—not the entire force, not even a significant portion of the force—who performed their duties in an unacceptable manner. It was only 14 years ago. I am referring to the FLQ crisis of 1970. That crisis was instrumental in redefining the Canadian concept of national security.

Most of us can probably recall the events quite vividly. It all started at 8:15 a.m. on October 5, 1970. James Cross was kidnapped from his home. At 4:15 p.m. that same day, the FLQ claimed responsibility. None of us could believe it was happening in Canada. The minutes and hours ticked away. We are all familiar with the outcome, but are we as aware that another clock was ticking? It was ticking much more slowly but it, too, was recording a series of events, not in minutes and hours but in days, months and years of RCMP involvement in the 1970 drama. Information was revealed bit by bit, a piece at a time. Canadians learned via the press and broadcast media of six incidents: first, the RCMP had falsified documents; second, the RCMP opened mail in contravention of postal legislation; third, the RCMP copied records of a legitimate political party; fourth, the RCMP harassed suspected extremists; fifth, the RCMP stole dynamite and, sixth, the RCMP burned a barn. Over and over again, 14 years of hearing about the various details of six main events.

I am not ignoring these activities. My response is the same as that of most Canadians—shock, dismay and disappointment. Rightly or wrongly, fairly or unfairly, a public perception was created that the RCMP had failed. I think, honourable colleagues, that a part of our minds, that which is most characteristic and most open to reason, would agree that it would be entirely misleading to see all these activities as a type. These activities differ in their degree of legitimacy as police or security measures. What the activities do indicate is a lack of communication and a lack of direction between a few members of the Force and their seniors. It also points to a lack of communication and direction from the minister responsible. "Responsible" becomes a key word.

Before I proceed to my second major concern, I would like to comment on the Solicitor General's stand that there would be no compromise or negotiation on the separation of security intelligence from the RCMP. Why? The reason I have been told is that two royal commissions recommended this action. I thought that that is what royal commissions do. They recommend hundreds of actions. The recommendations are most usually made in response to a specific issue within a specific time. A government, any government, cannot accept and cannot act upon every single royal commission recommendation. This issue is so vital to Canada and to the future of our Royal Canadian Mounted Police that, in my opinion, input should have been encouraged in all aspects of the bill. Again, the key word in the unravelling of events in 1970 and the RCMP involvement as well as the move to create a civilian spy agency is "responsible."

What did the numerous inquiries and commissions discover? I know what they did not find. They did not find any evidence whatsoever that the actions of those dozen or so RCMP officers sprang from any motive other than over-enthusiasm or lack of judgment. Would a separate civilian agency put an end to such errors in judgment? I think not. However, as recently as June 20 of this year, the CBC national news in reporting on Bill C-9 said that a separate spy agency was needed because the RCMP had, in their words "goofed up." Honourable colleagues, such criticism is totally unfair. I hope this idea of RCMP punishment is completely struck from the public conscience before any such legislation as Bill C-9 can become law. We must be responsible and we will be responsible for any subsequent actions of the civilian spy agency, should we permit this bill to be passed. Can any of us here guarantee that this separate agency will be free of so-called wrong doing?

Honourable senators, this brings me to my second point, the pros and cons of a separate civilian agency as opposed to maintaining security intelligence within a well-established force. The proposed legislation is supposed to create a review and accountability process for a new civilian agency. I wholeheartedly support the establishment of review and accountability mechanisms. However, I argue that these powers as spelled out in Bill C-9 could well become counterproductive.

The proposed review and accountability powers open the door to partisan political and bureaucratic influence and hindrance of activities. For example, we can begin with the director of the agency. The director, according to the legislation, will be appointed by the Cabinet. The Cabinet will set the term of office and the salary. In other words, the director can be a political appointee.

Let us look at the director's responsibilities. The director is to be the chief executive officer, as it were, of the agency. However, the legislation makes it clear that the director will operate, and I quote, "under the direction of the minister". This means that the director will be subject, by statute, to political control and direction.

The accountability process becomes more complex as a result of a requirement that the director shall be compelled to consult with the Deputy Minister of the Department of the Solicitor General on a range of matters including, and I quote, "the general operational policies of the service". As honourable senators are aware, deputy ministers are appointed by Cabinet—they, too, are political appointees.

The agency's bureaucratic demands are also excessive. The legislation proposes the appointment of a full-time officer known as the "Inspector General". The Inspector General will also be responsible to the deputy minister and this position is also a cabinet appointment.

Finally, the legislation will set up a Security Intelligence Review Committee to monitor the conduct and operations of the agency. Membership of the review committee is largely restricted to former cabinet ministers, and members are appointed by the Cabinet.

What does all this mean? The move to a separate civilian agency takes the responsibility for something as sensitive as security intelligence gathering from a Canadian institution staffed with trained personnel and gives it to a bureaucratic and potentially political organization.

Honourable senators, I ask you, as responsible Canadians and not as members of any political party, what is your preference? Do you think it a move in the right direction? As a concerned Canadian, I can honestly and forthrightly state I do not. However, others, such as Senator Gigantès, claim political interference, political direction is a necessity. They claim that political involvement in security intelligence is a real part of such work. I know what the people of some European countries would say about a political force of that sort. Clearly, this means a CIA for Canada.

The term "wrong doing" takes on new dimension. It would appear that a civilian agency would not improve upon the situation. In fact, the consequences could be far more serious than a barn-burning!

[Senator Kelly.]

Before I conclude, honourable senators, I would like to remind this chamber that since 1873—over 110 years, not just a decade—the RCMP have had a history of "right doings" which have made this uniquely Canadian institution a part of our national mythology. The RCMP is part of our heritage. It is part of Canadians' belief in law and order. The RCMP gives me, and many other Canadians, a sense of being protected in every sense of the word. To me, a country endures on the strength of its traditions, exemplified by its institutions.

I am not suggesting for a moment that there is an evil intent behind Bill C-9. I am merely suggesting that there exists an opportunity to create a political spy agency which could become dangerously partisan and that when an opportunity exists, someone, somewhere along the way, will misuse it. I do not believe for a moment that there is a danger of this happening under the present government. I do not believe there would be a danger of it happening under a Mulroney government or under a government led by John Turner. However, because the potential exists, the dangers are real and none of us can ensure the proposed powers would not be misused at some time.

Let us listen to that part of our minds which is characteristic. Let us all vote on conscience, for we are responsible to Canada and to Canadians. Let us have the last word on Bill C-9. Let the record show that honourable members of the Senate expressed a concern and a caution with respect to Bill C-9; concern with respect to the harm done to the image and reputation of the RCMP; concern for the civil liberties of Canadians; and concern for the notion that under a separate civilian spy agency the end justifies the means. Let the record show that honourable senators expressed caution to all involved—the government of the day and members of the new agency—not to misuse the powers.

My last word on this issue is that I wish that Bill C-9 would not be passed into law. My last word comes not only from that part of the mind which is most open to reason but from the heart.

As senators, we are responsible, just as the RCMP is responsible, to protect and safeguard Canadians by upholding the right. The best way to do that in this instance is to vote after careful thought and with conscience.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the duty to inform the Senate that if Senator Gigantès speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have listened with respect and admiration to the speeches of Senator Murray and Senator Kelly. With respect to Senator Murray's speech, I admired his partisan skills; with respect to Senator Kelly's speech, I admired the warmth of his heart. Although I agree that both senators make important points I beg to differ with their conclusions. As both senators have said, what we are discussing is a matter of national importance—it is not a partisan matter. Thus, I will speak in that spirit.

Yesterday, Senator Murray spoke of the definition of “threats to the security of Canada”. He said the definition is too broad. If honourable senators look at the copy of the bill, on page 2 they will find these words:

“threats to the security of Canada” means

(a) espionage or sabotage that is against Canada or is detrimental to the interests of Canada or activities directed toward or in support of such espionage or sabotage,

The only point at issue is with respect to the words “detrimental to the interests of Canada”. If we can imagine sabotage or espionage beneficial to the interests of Canada then who would object to it? The issue is with respect to the word “detrimental”.

Hon. Lowell Murray: We say it should be “to security interests of Canada”.

Senator Gigantès: I submit, honourable senators, that there may be sabotage which might not have much to do with the security of Canada in the sense of national defence. Juliet Belmas carried out such sabotage; others blew up electrical lines. Those actions were not necessarily threats to security in the sense of security against spies.

The only possible matter of dispute is with respect to the question of what is detrimental to the interests of Canada. In other words, who will decide what is detrimental to the security interests of Canada? Obviously, in a democracy the people decide. How do the people express their wishes in our democratic system? By electing a government. We delegate such authority to the government. Unless we propose a change in the system then the government must decide what is or is not detrimental. There is a consensus in Canada with respect to many of these issues—a consensus which unites Liberals, Conservatives and members of the New Democratic Party. For instance, I think nearly everyone would agree that we do not want Soviet spies to be successful in performing their tasks here in Canada. We do not want saboteurs to be successful in performing their tasks in Canada. Therefore, we all agree that the success of such people would be detrimental to the interests of Canada. If we look at paragraph (b), of the Interpretation section, here again the key issue is “detrimental to the interests of Canada”. Again, we must ask ourselves who decides what is detrimental to the interests of Canada, and again the answer is the same: It must be the people, and in our democratic system the people express their views and their will by electing a government to which they delegate the right to make such decisions. We have not come to the instant, press-a-button-on-TV-and-have-a-referendum situation on every issue. We have a government and it is the government that makes these decisions. Here again I think there is a view that represents a substantial majority of Canadian governments and of all parties on what is damaging to Canada in the way of foreign activity in this country.

Paragraph (c) of the same section breaks into two parts: Activities within Canada and activities outside Canada. This clause raises the question of serious violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective. Within Canada we are talking of an overwhelming consensus and an overwhelming majority of people who believe that we should not use violence in trying to achieve political objectives. We have seen an exception in the papers the other day. The unfortunate father of that young man, a member of the Squamish Five who used explosives. There was a picture of the father wearing a T-shirt that said “Doug’s Dad and proud of it” so obviously there is a small minority who believe they should use violence to achieve political ends and to express their opinions, but the vast majority of Canadians, be they Conservative, Liberal or NDP, disagree with the small minority and therefore we do not really have to worry about a decision that will be taken against such activities.

Looking for a moment at the question of activities outside Canada, here we have a question that is more moot. There is some violence that many Canadians would consider desirable against foreign governments. For instance, if Idi Amin Dada took power again in Uganda and some people here in Canada tried to organize his violent overthrow, many Canadians would say that this is desirable; if, on the other hand, we consider what the members of the Red Brigade are trying to do in Italy, most of us would say that that is undesirable; if we consider World War II, we find that we would all have agreed that the violent overthrow of Adolf Hitler would have been very desirable, but the violent overthrow of the present West German government would certainly be considered by the vast number of Canadians to be undesirable. In these instances, there must be decisions made as to what to concentrate on, since the resources of our security service are limited. Decisions must be made by the government after the security service informs them that a certain group is backing violence in another country, whether to direct or ask the police forces to interfere with that particular group. The decision must be political. There is a general distaste in this country against the use of force in changing political situations in other countries. There is a natural reluctance by Canadians to use such means and, in making decisions of this kind, the government must take these attitudes into account. Whatever our partisan discussions, there is no doubt about it that Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats are very much of one mind about this distaste and about not encouraging the use of violence to overthrow other governments, even some governments of which we do not approve.

It is possible, however, that on some occasions the government will not be as energetic in trying to stamp out such Canadian help for violent overthrow of a brutal tyranny abroad as in some other cases, so it is a political decision that is involved here; we cannot escape the fact that a political judgment must be exercised in such cases, and the political judgment in a democracy such as ours must be exercised by the government that has the confidence of Parliament.

Paragraph (d) of the Interpretation section says:

(d) activities directed toward undermining by covert unlawful acts, or directed toward or intended ultimately to lead to the destruction or overthrow by violence of, the constitutionally established system of government in Canada,

On that, I think, we also have a consensus. We cannot make these definitions tighter. We can, however, express an exception, as is done immediately afterwards:

but does not include lawful advocacy, protest or dissent, unless carried on in conjunction with any of the activities referred to in paragraphs (a) to (d).

In other words, unless the individuals concerned advocate violence or try to use violence. To be very specific, what this paragraph says is that it is perfectly all right to be a member of the Parti Québécois and advocate separatism but it is not all right to be a member of the FLQ and kill people, and we have a consensus on that. To try to make the definition even tighter, I humbly submit—although I am not a lawyer; I am a writer—would pose enormous problems of drafting and would not really solve the problem, because the problem comes down to a political government having to make political decisions at a particular point on what is right. If the government makes a mistake, our system provides penalties for that government.

Clause 12 was another clause which worried Senator Murray and, of course, it is a clause that must be given very careful consideration. It says:

12. The Service shall collect, by investigation or otherwise, to the extent that it is strictly necessary, and analyse and retain information and intelligence respecting activities that may on reasonable grounds be suspected of constituting threats to the security of Canada and, in relation thereto, shall report to and advise the Government of Canada.

Here, we are talking about a security agency that does not have enforcement powers. It is a security agency that must warn the government that there is a threat brewing, and the decision on how bad the threat is, and how important it is to ask a law enforcement agency—for instance the RCMP—to squash this particular movement must be political. There is no way in which we can escape that.

Clause 12 covers the prevention aspect. I submit that it would have been much better if our security services had discovered, through their analysing and collection of intelligence, that Miss Belmas was planning to blow up the Litton plant, by tapping her phone—a dirty trick referred to by Senator Murray—by following her—another dirty trick—by opening her mail—another dirty trick—by invading her privacy. It would have been much better if, by using such dirty tricks—which were those that I referred to in my article in the Gazette—the authorities had discovered that this young woman was planning to use explosives and had arrested her beforehand. She would be serving fewer years in jail than she now is, and the 10 people who were injured would not have been so injured.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Most importantly—and I stress this—clause 12 is a reference to the fact that the agency must inform the government; it cannot take law enforcement steps by itself. If law enforcement is to be carried out, the RCMP or other police forces will carry it out.

● (1200)

The next point that Senator Murray raised—and I group his points, if he will permit me to do so—related to the fact that supervision is flawed; that parliamentary control does not exist, but the review committee report will be tabled in Parliament each year. Appropriate parliamentary committees will have an opportunity to dissect that report and call any witnesses they wish. They can examine every single action that will be in that report. There is also provision, as was promised by the Solicitor General, that the government will undertake that the three members of the review committee will be appointed in consultation with the leaders of the other two parties in Parliament. In other words, all three parties will agree on the probity, ability and tenacity of the investigation of the three members of the review committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not necessarily.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Flynn, I think that it is necessarily because this is an undertaking given by the government.

Senator Flynn: Being consulted is not the same thing as making a decision.

Senator Gigantès: If I may disagree with the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, I do not think that any government—whether it be comprised of members of his party or the Liberal Party—would be prepared to get into a nasty debate over this issue and be accused of having appointed as members of the review committee people who do not have the trust and confidence of all three parties. That just would not work.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point at all. I will explain my point to you privately.

Senator Gigantès: We then come to the question of whether this review committee will be half blind, as Senator Murray has said, because it will not be able to look at cabinet documents.

I am afraid that the honourable senator yesterday gave a good demonstration of why, occasionally, cabinet documents should be withheld. The system that this country functions under is a system that has been copied to a large extent from the British system, which system I find admirable. Under that system senior public servants are encouraged to express their opinions freely, not only to Cabinet but among themselves, and they are free from partisan attack. I felt yesterday that the attack on Mr. Robert Rabinovitch was a partisan attack. Mr. Rabinovitch has the right to express to his fellow senior public servants his disagreement with their views and should not be criticized in this chamber for having done so. It should not have been implied that he was being partisan.

Senator Murray talked of senior public servants obeying their political masters. I might remind him that when the Conservative Party took over in 1979 they found that the senior public servants and the junior public servants obeyed their new political masters, as they should have. The Conservatives found, some to their surprise, that the Canadian public service was not partisan but was simply doing its job of serving its political masters, which it is appointed to do. When the Liberals took over in 1980 they did not penalize—

Senator Flynn: You have no mandate to speak for us.

Senator Gigantès: I did not quite hear you, senator.

Senator Flynn: I said that you have no mandate to speak for us.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): He did not.

Senator Flynn: He said "they found"; how does he know that?

Senator Gigantès: Your party declared that publicly. Senator Asselin told me how satisfied he was with the service he received from Mr. Dupuis, who was the then President of CIDA. I heard your Minister of External Affairs praise Mr. Gérard Pelletier for his excellent and non-partisan service to her. There are other instances. I can give you many more examples. Your Minister of Transport was very pleased with his deputy minister and said so publicly on many occasions.

If opinions—sometimes very strongly-held opinions—of public servants contained in cabinet documents which give advice to the Cabinet are to be made the subject of partisan debate, I submit that since they are only human they may be restrained in the freedom they must have to advise the government, and the government will be less well served if what is said in such confidential documents becomes the subject of partisan debate.

Senator Murray also said that other agencies which are peripherally engaged in intelligence gathering will not be under the control of the review committee. Those other agencies will not be allowed to obtain warrants to perform the type of surveillance the CSIS will perform. Moreover, the CSIS will have to report, says the bill, any deal it tries to strike with any other agency and get that deal approved before it can make that deal. Therefore, it will not be able to hand over, to farm out, to subcontract any of its activities without that being known, and without that being known eventually to Parliament. So control by Parliament is there through the review committee and through this bill.

We are really talking of day-to-day control, and the day-to-day control, the careful investigation and the writing of that report, I submit, belongs better in the hands of the review committee composed of Privy Councillors, as in the British pattern, than in the hands of parliamentary committees where partisanship is bound to intrude.

Senator Murray also brought out a section of the McDonald report which spoke of an intervention by the Honourable John Turner. He then asked about the image of the RCMP in view of its activities. That was presented by my honourable colleague as something bad.

Senator Murray: Inadequate for the Minister of Justice.

Senator Gigantès: I respectfully submit to the honourable senator that the image of the RCMP is of paramount importance. I fully agreed with Senator Kelly when he said that we are blessed by having such a great police force.

Senator Flynn: He was more concerned about the position of the government—

Senator Gigantès: You will have to excuse me, Senator Flynn, but I am getting more and more advanced in my age and my hearing is not very good. Would you mind repeating that? You may do so in French, if you wish, as I speak that language also.

In any event, the image of the RCMP is not a question of cosmetics. The trust society has in its police force is part of the cement that holds a society together. The ancient Athenians mistrusted policemen so much that they imported Scythian slaves to carry out police activities. No decent Athenian citizen would have accepted the position of a police officer, which eventually proved to be bad for that society. Here we are blessed with a police force in whose image we trust and that image must be preserved, and Mr. Turner put his finger exactly on that and was speaking as Senator Kelly was when he said that that image was very important. It was not inadequate; it was a response that went to the heart of the matter.

Senator Murray: He should have told them to stop. That was his job as the chief law officer of the Crown.

Senator Gigantès: The RCMP, said Senator Murray, is a guarantee against partisan political control. This bill establishes more mechanisms against partisan political control than we have ever had in Canada, or more than have existed in any other country. In fact, this bill has provisions which would have forced those few wrongdoers—and I agree with Senator Kelly that they are few—to inform the Solicitor General beforehand. What is the use of telling them to stop doing it when they have already done it? This is what we are talking about. I do not really follow the logic which opposes this bill when this bill actually is trying to achieve the very objectives that Senator Murray was seeking.

● (1210)

Further, this bill gives a potential target of a security investigation motivated by partisan political reasons recourse which has not existed before. Believe me, I know of what I speak. A public servant or someone who wants to find employment in a defence plant, or someone who is employed in a defence plant but is accused of being a security risk, now will have notice within 10 days and will be able to defend himself. This did not exist before. If you are the target of a security investigation and you suspect that this is motivated by partisan political reasons, you have a better chance now of finding that out than you did previously and more of a chance of defending yourself than you did before. I submit that this is a bill which does much more than has ever been done before in this or any other country to provide us with the security we need and to protect us against abuses by those whom we charge to defend this security. It gives us a better chance of knowing in advance that there are some people who have not heard of Talleyrand and who would not heed his advice to young French diplomats which was:

Messieurs, surtout pas trop de zèle!

That would answer the concerns of Senator Kelly because under this bill they would have to report much more carefully what they intended to do and those distasteful episodes which have wrongly been used in the press to smear the reputation of the entire RCMP, which is an admirable force, would have been prevented before they happened. That is an important issue to consider.

The separation which Senator Kelly finds difficult, and the solution which he suggests—that the two services coexist under the RCMP—was tried under Mr. Starnes. Even Mr. Starnes thinks it did not work; the McDonald commission thinks it did not work; the Senate committee thought it did not work; and for good reason.

Senator Kelly: In fairness, you should acknowledge that they had very different mandates. My suggestion is that the same safeguards could apply to the agency within the RCMP.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Murray said yesterday that the RCMP would not be too unhappy at seeing the security and intelligence division off its shoulder because it has been a kind of albatross. I agree with Senator Kelly that we must not view this as punishment for the RCMP. I return to the British example. They have this division; they have long had it, and it works better.

Senator Kelly mentioned that the director would be appointed by the Cabinet. He would be appointed by the Cabinet under a very tight mandate. Deputy ministers are appointed by the cabinet. Even the Governor General is chosen on the advice of the Prime Minister. I do not see how we can escape that.

An Hon. Senator: And judges.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. And judges.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about senators?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Kelly also said that no one can be sure that under this mandate the power of Canadian security and intelligence service will not be misused. Of course not, but no one could have been sure before, as events have proven, that there were not going to be a few overzealous and overenthusiastic young men—or not so young men—in the RCMP who would do the same. I see no absolute guarantee in relation to any human activity. What this bill is trying to achieve is to do more to protect individual freedoms, to exclude partisan political activity than has ever been done before or has ever been done in any other country.

In closing, I should like to return to Senator Murray. I am sure that his professors, when he was doing his M.A. thesis, would have objected to his partial quotations. He lifted Professor Peter Russell's statement, which he quoted yesterday, out of context because Professor Russell reached the conclusion that follows the statement that Senator Murray quoted, and I will quote that conclusion. Professor Peter Russell, Research Director of the McDonald commission said:

This is far better than half a loaf. It is a pretty good bill. I can't think in living memory of legislation coming as close to a royal commission's whole set of recommendations as C-9 now does. Let's get on with the job.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Gigantès referred to the advisability—and I agree—that cabinet documents which contain advice to the government and which are in the control of the agency should not be available for inspection by the Inspector General. What about cabinet documents recording decisions made by the government and which the agency has because it is supposed to act upon those decisions? Should not those documents be revealed to the Inspector General?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I submit that when it comes to events happening in other countries with which Canadian citizens may have some connections, there may be extremely delicate diplomatic issues involved which other countries or our allies might not like to have brought out. We are not talking only of activities against the Red Brigade or activities in support of Afghan freedom fighters. We may be dealing with activities by similar services working for our allies against joint espionage by the Eastern Bloc in our country. In such circumstances what is included in the cabinet document might be very embarrassing to our allies, or to the government, and might make discussions with our opponents harder because, as you know, we are fighting Soviet spies at the same time as we are trying to sweet talk the Soviets into disarmament. They might not appreciate it if we were to expose publicly some of the things we do to them, and they know we do to them. It is a propaganda issue, a loss-of-face issue, and some of these documents may have to stay secret because they involve the diplomatic activities of the government and our relations with other countries and it might jeopardize those relations.

Senator Godfrey: Surely, though, a cabinet document is no different from any other document, and the Inspector General has to use his own judgment and not reveal top secrets to the public. I am referring only to cabinet documents which contain a directive, for example, as to how the agency is to perform its tasks. That document would be in the hands of the agency because it would need it for reference. Why should that not be, at least, given to the Inspector General? He must use his own judgment as to whether it should be made public, as he must with other types of documents. I am concerned with whether the Inspector General should have available to him documents emanating from the cabinet which are directing and guiding the agency itself and which he should know about, whether he decides to make them public or not.

Senator Gigantès: The general directions to the agency are included in this bill. This is the directive. This is where the agency is told what to do and how to do it.

Cabinet documents will contain directions about specific actions of the security agency referring to specific instances—in other words, answers to the security agency's inquiries such as, "Do you consider this dangerous; are you going to do something about it or not?"—and that might prove very embarrassing to Canada on the international scene, I submit.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Anderson, for the second reading of the Bill C-40, intituled: "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to respond on behalf of my party to the sponsor's introduction of Bill C-40, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

I would commend Senator Bosa for his clear explanation of this bill and its important clauses. As he pointed out, it provides an additional $50 per month to every single pensioner receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement, an amount which will be paid in two instalments: the first $25 in July and the balance in December. This will eventually amount to a total of $460 million. However, this begs the first question: Why is this being paid in two instalments? The only answer I can find is that $50 looks much more appealing to the recipient just before an election, even though the senior citizens who qualify will have to wait until the end of the year to receive the full benefit. However, honourable senators, half a loaf is better than none at all, and it is obvious that no one will object to increasing payments to a more reasonable level for those of our older citizens who are eligible. Certainly, the increases are needed since it remains more and more difficult for them to continue to cope with increases in the cost of living.

This increase, of course, is in addition to the regular cost-of-living increases that all pensioners will receive in July, October and in January of 1985 and will, as the minister has indicated in various press releases, bring the single OAS recipient to an income level of some $600 per month.

One of the advantageous aspects of the bill is that it will help a good number of single female pensioners, who make up a high percentage of senior citizens, who have been too long neglected.

Clause 12 of the bill relates to the amendments which were made by Bill C-38 which we passed only a couple of weeks ago. That bill amended the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act whereby single war veterans allowance recipients benefit and are entitled to the $50 increase. This will be provided to those veterans by topping up or increasing the maximum allowable income by the same amount of $50 in the two stages.

Other amendments that prove acceptable, as mentioned by Senator Bosa, will help some 3,000 immigrants who have lived in Canada for between 10 and 40 years, and who, by the passage of this bill, will be paid benefits similar to those of native-born Canadians in similar economic circumstances. For the last several years, immigrants receiving the GIS or the spouse's allowance received benefits that were pro-rated to the number of years they had lived in Canada with 40 years of residence, of course, being the normal requirement for full benefits. The passage of this bill would reduce that period to 10 years.

Finally, the bill proposes to reduce the time a person has to wait after separation from a spouse to qualify for income supplement benefits as a single person. The new waiting period will be six months as compared to the present waiting period of one or two years. I believe Senator Bosa also clarified that point. However, one item which is missing from this bill relates to the warning of the minister given in a news release on June 13 when she urged her provincial colleagues to pass on the increase directly to pensioners who live in institutions of care in the provinces unless, of course, it can be demonstrated that the services in the institutions are improved so as to benefit the recipient.

In this regard, it should be mentioned that institutions charge most of the OAS and the GIS received by the residents to cover room and board, but they do allow pensioners to retain a portion of the benefit as a comfort allowance to be spent on personal needs. It is, therefore, imperative in my mind that institutions do not raise their charges for room and board but, instead, allow the increase to add to the comfort of the pensioners most in need.

Honourable senators, while the increases arising out of this bill are appreciated, is it not a wonder that, despite the countless studies that have been carried out over the years on health care—certainly, on pension reform in the past year and a half—and on the problems of the handicapped and the disabled, we seem to be unable to find a formula that will result in creating a plan that will meet the needs of those who must depend on government for a reasonable quality of life? Instead, as has been the habit over the years, we give another handout; we find a catch-up contribution to overcome the embarrassing state of conditions and to bring our senior citizens to reach the poverty line—depending, of course, on whose poverty line figure is reasonable and where the pensioner happens to live, whether it be a rural or urban area.

Honourable senators, I am not attempting to take any credibility away from the sincerity of the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I feel it is the fault of Cabinet that senior citizens are not getting their just due—but one would have expected that any bill on social reform at this time would certainly have included an approach to or the introduction of substantive change to the pension system, especially after so many studies, much publicized conferences, and federal-provincial discussions which, evidently, found the answers.

The most striking deficiency in the pension system—and it was referred to in the other place by Bruce Halliday, MP—exists for the millions of Canadian women who were housewives, confined to the day-to-day drudgery of housework on behalf of their families. While there is nothing wrong with this way of life and this sort of duty to the family, these women deserve to participate in the pension system so that they will be protected in later years in case of need. The cold hard facts and the statistics that are available support the existence of that need and demand recognition in the form of legislation.

Another omission from the bill is the recognition of the need for pensions for the disabled and the handicapped. Honourable senators are aware of the three-year study conducted by a committee of the other place on the disabled and the handicapped. That study was hailed across the country as an effective report which was worthy of support by way of action on the part of government. Of the 130 recommendations, 11 evidently dealt significantly with income security for disabled people. In particular, recognition must be given to the fact that the disabled have extraordinary expenses over and above those of the able-bodied—a situation which must be taken care of.

The most important issue, however, that must be addressed is the piecemeal approach to income security and the difficulty in classifying people with various degrees of dependency on the state. Income levels vary depending on age levels and so on. This leads to an amalgam of programs which conflict and cross over different levels of governmental responsibility. Because of this, I feel that we should be looking again at the merits of a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians. In that way, we might address the basic needs of all low-income and needy groups, including those who are employed but whose wages are insufficient for their needs. A re-study of the various approaches to such a program could be undertaken by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology under its ongoing responsibility for various aspects of social affairs.

Honourable senators, I have asked myself this question: What do the senior citizens themselves feel about this bill and about the increases to the GIS? The National Advisory Council on Aging, at its tenth annual meeting, advocated a consultation process with senior citizens by which to enable that council to develop an advocacy position on a number of issues relevant to aging. It is proposed that the consultations take place across Canada over the next two years. This action plan is entitled "Listen to Me!" and was announced by the president of the National Advisory Council, Yhetta Gold. She stated: "It is about time for seniors to combine forces to make a greater impact on decision-makers." Evidently, despite all of the studies that have been conducted and all of the conferences sponsored by government, this group has its doubts about what the government is doing and wishes to be heard.

This same group asked the leadership contestants at the recent Liberal convention for their views on social affairs and on help to the aged. After hearing from all of the leadership contenders, the council put this question:

Shouldn't politicians be more preoccupied with enhancing seniors' independence and their increased participation in the nation's business?

Honourable senators, there are many other aspects of the bill that could be the subject of another debate. In conclusion I will simply say that I am charged with expressing our agreement with the principle of Bill C-40 and with its reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for an in-depth study.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Bosa speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall has raised one basic and important point in connection with this bill, which is that it does not look at the entire spectrum of pension benefits. I want to assure Senator Marshall that the minister, when she presented the bill in the other place, stated that further study will be done in the pension field. As well, she stated that, at present, there are ongoing consultations with the provinces to make changes to the Canada Pension Plan and to the Pension Benefits Standards Act. There are also extensive consultations taking place with the private sector.

Honourable senators, I believe that that was the only question put to me by Senator Marshall.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill C-37, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Housing Act".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, much of Bill C-37 is unexplainable. I have noticed in the past that, when this situation arises, the government always calls upon Senator Frith to do the introduction—he is expected to explain the unexplainable. He does this by attempting to oversimplify the difficulties and by exaggerating the benefits. The Honourable Senator Frith could see a benefit in a tidal wave following an earthquake as long as someone in the Liberal establishment told him to do so.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You could use the tidal power to repair the damage of the earthquake.

Senator Phillips: That illustrates my point.

Honourable senators, we on this side of the house are pleased with the reports emanating from the other side that, on Saturday, Senator Frith will become the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Frith: We already have one of those, thank you.

Senator Phillips: While we wish him well in that position, we would advise him not to bother moving his office because he will only have to vacate it again shortly after Labour Day.

Senator Frith: Senator Phillips is certainly full of advice today.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have always enjoyed the introductions of bills by the Honourable Senator Frith. I hope his new position will not make him arrogant or pompous and destroy that happy facility for exuberant exaggeration that he possesses.

Senator Frith: Speaking of oversimplification!

Senator Phillips: I am also intrigued by the fact that he is going to be appointed by the Prime Minister to this position. Senator Frith is continually advocating the election of the Senate. I thought he would suggest to the Prime Minister designate that he have his appointment submitted to a secret ballot in the Senate. I know that he will get at least one vote if he does that. If he opens the vote to those of us on this side of the chamber, he will get more.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well, he may get two.

Senator Frith: It does not take many to be more than one.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I watched the minister's announcement of this bill on television and found it to be rather depressing. The minister was pressed by the media to explain how the mortgage rate protection would work. He was unable to explain how it would work. He was unable to give an estimate of the cost, or even the number of people who would take advantage of the scheme. He could not do any of those things because there were too many unknowns. The cost to the federal treasury would depend upon the number of participants in the scheme and future interest rates. He gave me the impression that he was tired of being a cabinet minister, that he was tired of his own mistakes—I can understand that—and that he was even more tired of the numerous mistakes made by his government—and that is even more understandable. He left me with the impression that he did not know, and he did not care, how the program was going to work.

Housing in Canada is plagued by high purchase costs and high interest rates. We have had a series of finance ministers since the Honourable John Turner initiated the principle of deficit financing, each outdoing the other to increase the deficit. We had Donald Macdonald. He is now studying the economic aspects of Canada's future. We have had Jean Chrétien, Allan MacEachen and Marc Lalonde. All of them have achieved—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): What about John Crosbie?

Senator Phillips: Yes, we had one good minister in that succession, I will admit. I thank the honourable senator for reminding me of that fact. All that we have achieved through this is inflation and record unemployment. The Cabinet has attempted to control these factors by imposing higher interest rates.

As Senator Frith stated yesterday evening, Canadians are now hesitant to purchase homes because of their fear of increasing interest rates. But the fear of Canadians has increased in the past two weeks. John Turner has been the Liberal leader for only two weeks and already interest rates have gone up 1 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: While interest rates have gone one way, the dollar has gone the other. Iona Campagnolo stated, following the Liberal leadership convention, that there was one disaster, that the balloons did not come down. It is very simple. She tied them to the interest rates, and naturally they went up instead of coming down.

The sponsor, in one of the more humorous aspects of his introduction last evening, said that the reduction of mortgage interest rates was part of the government's economic recovery program. Surely, honourable senators, lower interest rates, as advocated by so many of the Liberal candidates during the leadership race, would have been much more effective in producing a better economic recovery. So much for the new liberalism.

The principle of Bill C-37 indicates that it is necessary to look back on the record and service of the Liberal Party and not just to look ahead. We have to consider what has happened in the past years of a Liberal government. The record contains such failures as deficit financing and high interest rates. I would ask honourable senators whether, in view of past experience, it is reasonable to assume that an insurance scheme will make high interest rates any more successful in the future than they have been in the past?

The insurance scheme contains a rather novel idea. The same premium applies for a one-year mortgage, a three-year mortgage or a five-year mortgage. Honourable senators, if we were to apply that to car insurance, we would pay car insurance when we purchased a car, and the insurance, like the muffler, would be guaranteed for as long as we owned the car.

It was difficult to see any benefit in insuring either a one- or a three-year mortgage. Interest rates must rise by 2 percentage points before any benefits are received, and a premium in excess of $1,000 virtually eliminates one-year mortgages. Three-quarters of the increase beyond 2 percentage points are covered, and this fact alone makes a three-year mortgage benefit rather dubious.

Senator Frith emphasized the possible benefits of a five-year mortgage. Let us consider for a moment a five-year mortgage. Such a mortgage today will have cost at least 15 per cent, and probably more, and the rate in five years time would have to reach 17 per cent before the individual paying the premiums would be eligible for any benefits. Surely the government is not so pessimistic that they can see nothing down the road except a return to mortgage rates ranging from 18 per cent to 20 per cent. Surely there must be something better in the prospect than that.

Senator Frith: I can see what you meant by your difficulty in understanding.

Senator Phillips: The principle of the bill is that there will be benefits if mortgage rates return to a range of 18 per cent to 20 per cent; otherwise one is wasting a $1,000 premium.

Senator Frith described this as a cushion. I do not believe it is a cushion. It is merely a poorly embroidered cushion cover. You forgot to put anything in the cushion, senator, and I would suggest that you take a look at the Progressive Conservative Party's policy, and then fill up the cushion. It would be much more effective that way.

Mortgage-backed securities are a second aspect of Bill C-37. The sponsor emphasized that mortgage-backed securities work extremely well in the United States. But, honourable senators, there are a number of programs working in the United States that apparently are not working in Canada. They have a lower rate of unemployment, a lower rate of inflation, and a GNP rate three times as high as ours.

An Hon. Senator: And the highest crime rate.

Senator Phillips: Obviously because a program works in the United States, it does not imply that it will automatically work in Canada.

Senator Frith: Shall we remove that part?

Senator Phillips: Have a look at it, yes. In fact, have a look at the whole bill. The sponsor envisions insurance companies, pension funds and other sources of funds falling all over themselves to invest in mortgage-backed securities for a ten-year period. But what the sponsor neglected to tell us is that the government already has ten-year certificates. Today we are paying 13.5 per cent on those certificates. Add an insurance premium and the service fee, and we are up to at least 15 per cent.

Those responsible for investing funds are not naive, stupid or Liberal "yes" men. They are responsible for investing those funds to give the highest possible return. That means the highest interest rate available. They do not have to turn to a program such as mortgage-backed securities, because the program already exists in other securities, and I do not see any great influx into that program.

One important source of mortgage funds today is the vendor taking back a mortgage. Many people use their home to provide a retirement fund. They sell the home, take back a mortgage, and they get a monthly income in principal and interest. But for some strange reason, that source of funds is not covered under the legislation. Is there a particular reason for that, Senator Frith?

Senator Frith: Yes. I will speak to that.

Senator Phillips: Thank you. Considerable concern has been expressed in financial circles about the long-term effects of the mortgage-backed securities on the availability of funds for other purposes such as the five-year guaranteed income certificates, which banks and other financial institutions use to balance their five-year mortgage program. The present rather unsuccessful Minister of Finance has promised in his budget that the federal government will investigate the economic and financial impact of this legislation on mortgage rates and on competing ten-year financial instruments such as the federal government ten-year certificates. Would the sponsor of the bill give us an indication of the results of that study? Presumably it was carried out before the legislation was prepared and introduced, and we would prefer to see it now rather than after the bill becomes law.

● (1250)

Native or Indian housing on reservations is a federal responsibility. The amendments that are made to the Rural and Native Housing Program are good ones and I am pleased with the extra funding that is being made available. But when we come to the clause that provides for emergency repairs, I am wondering whether we are not condemning the present legislation when we say that we will provide for emergency repairs to make the houses safe, sanitary and habitable. Paragraph 7(2)(b) states that a disadvantaged person occupying a family housing unit in a designated area who is not the owner of the unit may receive a contribution for urgent repairs. I have two questions arising from that paragraph. First, I am intrigued by the use of the phrase "disadvantaged person." In looking for an explanation of that phrase I turned to the minutes of the committee of the House of Commons. A "disadvantaged person" is an Indian. Therefore, this clause only applies on reservations. I am wondering why it was necessary to use the phrase "disadvantaged person." Is there anything wrong with the word "Indian?" I do not find anything wrong with it and I am not ashamed to use it. I do not use it in a disparaging sense. So why have they not used the word "Indian" in the legislation? The other question arises from the fact that this paragraph refers only to the male gender. Are Indian women excluded from this clause? Are they excluded from the benefits of this act? If not, the paragraph should say "he or she" or "him or her."

Last evening the sponsor of the bill in his exuberant exaggeration stated that there is no subsidy involved in Bill C-37.

The federal government has introduced a program that will provide solutions and, lo and behold, it is not going to cost the taxpayer a cent. However, if we look at the bill we find that funds flow into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and flow out again like quarters through a slot machine. Anyone who has taken even the briefest look at our huge deficit must realize that more funds come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund than go into it. This has been the pattern all along and, undoubtedly, it will be the pattern if anyone purchases this insurance. I ask the sponsor of the bill to come clean and tell us how many mortgages will be taken out, the anticipated administrative costs and the anticipated losses to the program. In all fairness, I must tell Senator Frith that I will be rather skeptical of the projections. Liberal finance ministers are not known for their accuracy. But we have learned over the years to take their estimated losses, double them and get a ball-park figure. It works very well in most cases except when we come to Senator Austin: then we have to quadruple them.

I hope that this afternoon in committee we will receive some information on the costs of the program to the taxpayer and that there will be people present to give us accurate information on the costs. We look forward to hearing from these people and I am sure that the sponsor will arrange for them to be present.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Phillips for his intervention and sympathize with his inability to understand. I must say that my sympathy is increased in part when I realize that he suffers from what I suppose could be called a professional hazard because any one of us who has been to a dentist are familiar with how dentists like to talk rather than listen, especially when they have your mouth full of sponges and drills.

Senator Phillips: We don't use that many sponges.

Senator Frith: He has shown that in the course of his professional career he did not learn very much about listening but he learned a good deal about speaking. I found his rather fanciful intervention entertaining, as usual.

However, he did raise some particular points. First I will deal with the question of why mortgages back are excluded. There are three reasons. There is the question of standardization. Those who qualify as certified lenders under the program have to meet certain requirements and obligations, which is natural for a scheme of this kind. Of course, in the case of vendors taking back mortgages, these kinds of regulations and controls would not be possible. There is also a question of delivery. Under the Mortgage Rate Protection Program, certified lenders have an active role when delivering mortgage coverage. It is felt that sellers who enter into vendor-take-back arrangements do not always have the capability over the long term to deliver the Mortgage Rate Protection Program. Then there is the problem of the arm's-length transaction. The experience in dealing with approved lenders and/or certified lenders has shown that the mortgage financing transaction is conducted in a more professional manner than what takes place at arm's-length. Those are the three reasons that mortgages back are not included in the scheme. However, I think that Senator Phillips has asked a very relevant question.

As to the impact of mortgage-backed investments on the market, discussions were held with financial institutions on the impact of the securities and it was generally felt that these securities would be well received in financial markets. The overall size of the capital market is very large, with some $50 billion in new money being raised each year outside the mortgage market. So the experts in the field, including those actively in the field, expect that these securities will have very little impact on the general level of interest rates. Yet, increasing the flow of funds into mortgages could put downward pressure on mortgage rates.

As to the question of using the phrase "disadvantaged persons" rather than the word "Indian", we might want to refine and discuss the matter in committee today but it was not my understanding that "disadvantaged persons" was limited to Indians, although that may be what was said in the House of Commons committee. I had thought that that clause dealt with rural and native disadvantaged persons. Senator Phillips also referred to the use of words referring only to the male gender in paragraph 7(2)(b). I think this would be covered by the Interpretation Act and that that paragraph would apply to women, though the male gender is referred to in the article.

Finally, with respect to the question of the subsidy, I thought I made it clear both to Senator Roblin and to Senator Phillips that I am not suggesting there is no possibility that the result of this scheme, which is essentially an insurance scheme, will be negative. That is to say, there will be money charged against the Consolidated Revenue Fund when it all washes out. The purpose of the scheme is to have it result in a zero balance. In other words, there will be neither a profit nor a loss. Of course, if it could be seen that there would be assured profits, then the private sector would be involved through the insurance companies. The government is in the scheme because no profit can be assured. If it turns out that there is a loss, as Senator Phillips says, then it will come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

When I say that the scheme is not a subsidy, I mean that it is not in the nature of a subsidy wherein the government simply steps in and says, "There is no insurance; there is no fee. We will subsidize." In this instance there is a fee. In its nature the scheme is a self-financing insurance scheme. If it fails to finance itself then there will be a draw on the taxpayer. I am in agreement with that point. That is the sense in which I say it is not a subsidy.

Honourable senators, I ask for support of the motion for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to.

In particular, the Committee wishes to thank Mr. Graham Claytor, President, Amtrak; Mr. James H. English, Vice-President, Government Affairs; Mr. Robert Gall, Vice-President, Marketing; Mr. Wilfred Leatherwood, Manager, State and Local Services; Ms. Diane Elliot, Director, Corporate Communications; Mr. R. Preski, Head of Maintenance, Chicago Maintenance Terminal; and Mr. W.A. Barrick, General Manager, Beech Grove Heavy Repair and Rebuilding Facility for their efforts.

The Committee believes that special mention should be made of the contribution of Mr. Jim Barber, Director, Intergovernmental Affairs for Amtrak, who on short notice arranged and co-ordinated the tour and briefings, and who worked closely with the Committee and its staff in preparation for, as well as during its visits. Without his extraordinary and professional efforts on our behalf this portion of our study would not have been as valuable as it was for the Committee. His collaboration and efforts are greatly appreciated.

The Committee also acknowledges the assistance provided by the Canadian Embassy in Washington D.C. and the Canadian Consulates in New York, Chicago, Atlanta and New Orleans for its travel in the United States.

Special mention must also be made of the contributions of the Committee's staff. The Committee expresses its appreciation to Mr. André Reny, Clerk of the Committee, who facilitated the administrative aspect of our work — particularly the arrangements for travel, hearings and the co-ordination of witnesses. The Committee is also indebted to John Christopher, Research Officer, from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, who provided the expertise and did the research necessary to provide the basis of the findings and recommendations for this report.

APPENDIX — LIST OF WITNESSES

VIA RAIL LEGISLATION

1. The Committee recommends that legislation be enacted by the Parliament of Canada at the earliest possible time to establish VIA Rail on its own statutory basis with a mandate to provide a sound and efficient national rail passenger system.

2. The Committee recommends that the ACT include a clear statement of the Government's policy regarding VIA's provision of rail passenger service.

3. The Committee recommends that the ACT include provisions authorizing VIA Rail to own, manage, and operate intercity passenger trains, and/or contract for the operation of passenger trains and, that insofar as it is practicable, VIA Rail shall directly operate and control all aspects of its rail passenger service.

4. The Committee recommends that the ACT include the establishment of specific service commitments for rail passenger services with a time-frame for their implementation.

5. The Committee recommends that the ACT include provisions for VIA Rail to enter into agreement(s) with parties for the provision of passenger rail services if the need arises.

6. The Committee recommends the establishment of a Joint Parliamentary Committee on transportation to report, within two years of the enactment of the legislation, on the effectiveness of the ACT and to propose any changes it deems necessary.

OPERATING CONTRACTS AND COSTING PROCEDURES

7. The Committee recommends that under the ACT, VIA Rail be given the power to negotiate operating contracts with the railways employing the concept of short-term avoidable costs and that in the event of failure to reach a satisfactory voluntary agreement, VIA Rail shall have the right to appeal to the CTC for arbitration.

8. The Committee recommends that the operating contracts between VIA Rail Canada Inc. and the railways be based on a flat rate costing methodology where each costing element is paid for by a fixed monthly payment to the maximum extent possible — with provisions for amendments to allow for changes in such items as wages and the level of services.

9. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail, in order to better negotiate contracts, be given the right to complete access to the railways' financial and operational records for detailed studies prior to negotiating a new contract, including post-audits of billings and payments.

10. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail Canada be required by law to keep all costing data confidential.

11. The Committee recommends that until such time as these contract and costing recommendations have been implemented, VIA Rail be given full access to the 1981 CTC audit report of CP service charges to VIA Rail and all subsequent audit reports of both operating railroads.

SUBSIDIES FOR PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE

Competition

12. The Committee recommends that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, or the Joint Parliamentary Committee (referred to in recommendation 6) conduct, at its earliest possible convenience, a complete study into the subsidy question with the view to determining how much the various transportation modes are subsidized. This study would determine whether or not one mode has an unfair competitive advantage over another mode and cite recommendations to redress any inequities.

Cost Recovery

13. The Committee recommends that, within a VIA Rail Canada Act, appropriate levels of subsidy be established together with the attendant levels of service that should be provided by VIA Rail.

PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE

Maintenance Centres

14. The Committee recommends that in order for VIA Rail to have complete control over its maintenance facilities, the work done in them, and the costs incurred in such work, consideration be given to having VIA Rail employees carry out such duties. This may involve the transfer of employees and/or the hiring of new employees.

Railcar Rebuilding

15. The Committee recommends that the rebuilding of heritage rail cars, including the conversion from steam to electric power, be undertaken by VIA Rail in order to upgrade equipment and increase the usable inventory of the railway especially for use in off-corridor service. Consideration should also be given to establishing a facility where this work could be done by VIA Rail employees under direct control of VIA rather than being contracted out.

16. The Committee recommends that in addition to the rebuilding of heritage cars, the program to develop a prototype train set for use in Western Canada and Atlantic Canada proceed with the greatest possible dispatch. The car rebuilding program should not be viewed as replacing the need for new equipment for off-corridor use but rather as an interim measure until new equipment is developed.

Priority of Passenger Trains

17. The Committee recommends that railway sidings be lengthened where necessary to handle long freight trains in order to give passenger trains priority when "meets" occur.

18. The Committee recommends that under the ACT, passenger trains be given priority over freight trains in the use of trackage to the greatest extent possible.

19. The Committee recommends that the ACT establishing VIA Rail Canada allow for incentives and penalties to be assessed within the operating contracts between VIA Rail and the railways for attaining (or not attaining) on-time performance standards.

Labour

20. The Committee recommends that Labour be actively included in VIA Rail's design and testing of new equipment in order to provide the railway and the customer with the best possible trains.

21. The Committee recommends that a railway labour representative sit on the Board of Directors of VIA Rail in order to provide more direct input from employees for the overall benefit of passenger rail service.

Route Development

22. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail, under a new VIA Rail Canada Act, be required to develop a comprehensive plan for the improvement of all inter-city rail passenger transportation, including route structure, level of service, and types of equipment to be used. This should be submitted to Parliament expeditiously, with route abandonments subject to CTC approval only after an adequate public hearing process has been completed.

MARKETING FUNCTIONS

23. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail institute a policy whereby a larger number of agencies have authority to sell and distribute VIA Rail tickets. One way this could be done is by linking travel agencies to a computer ticketing operation such as is used by Air Canada.

24. The Committee recommends that the telephone inquiry and reservation system that is presently employed by VIA be upgraded.

VIA-AMTRAK SERVICES

25. The Committee recommends that, in consultation with Amtrak, VIA Rail actively undertake studies to improve and expand rail links and/or joint services between Canada and the United States.

RESTORATION OF PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES

26. The Committee recommends that the Atlantic Limited linking Central Canada through Sherbrooke, Quebec, and southern New Brunswick to Halifax be restored immediately.

FOREWORD

On 6 July 1982 the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications presented its Interim Report on Passenger Rail Service provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc. It was noted then that the Committee would require more time to complete its study of this complex subject. After conducting further examination under a new order of reference, the Committee is still of the opinion that further investigations and hearings, especially in the areas of costing, government subsidies, and provision of regional passenger services are required in order to fulfill its mandate. For this reason, the Committee is presenting another interim report. If the current parliamentary session is not ended by prorogation, the Committee will continue its investigations.

In this interim report the Committee outlines what has occurred since July 1982 in the rail passenger field. As well, it describes those areas that it believes requires urgent attention if Canada is to have a truly adequate rail passenger system. In doing this, the Committee recognizes that many of the recommendations presented in this report are intertwined and dependent on each other. Because of this, the recommendations presented here should be viewed in their totality and not as separate elements which can be implemented on a piecemeal basis. Their maximum effect can only be attained if they are implemented as a total package for the improvement of Canada's rail passenger system. The Committee also recognizes that many of the recommendations require the enactment of VIA Rail legislation (i.e., a VIA Rail Canada Act) if they are to have the desired impact on the passenger rail system.

INTRODUCTION

On 19 January 1984 the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications received its order of reference from the Senate of Canada which reads as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the first session of the present Parliament be referred to the Committee.

Pursuant to this reference the Committee began its hearings on 21 February 1984 and heard witnesses with varying concerns regarding national rail passenger services. Included in this process was an extensive examination and tour of Amtrak's operations and facilities in the United States during the month of April.<sup>(1)</sup> This enabled the Committee to compare and contrast our passenger rail system with one which started from much the same beginnings and which has evolved into an efficient passenger rail corporation. This report attempts to deal with the concerns that were raised before the Committee in a fair and accurate manner and to provide recommendations and suggestions to ensure that a sound and viable passenger rail system is established.

SHOULD VIA RAIL EXIST?

The title of this report is not intended to be facetious. It reflects the Committee's concern about the future of passenger rail transport in Canada. An atmosphere of uncertainty has been created in many regions of Canada that perhaps there really is no future for this type of transportation system. The long history of poorer and poorer passenger service and the service cutbacks announced by the Government in 1981 caused this uncertainty and put the future of passenger rail transportation in doubt.

Recent problems, especially during the Christmas period in December 1983 with equipment breakdowns resulting in long delays, have been viewed as indications that VIA Rail still is not committed to providing an adequate rail service. The Committee believes that underlying the whole issue of passenger rail transportation is the question of whether or not the Government is committed to the existence of VIA Rail, or even to passenger rail services. As stated in its first interim report, the Committee is still of the opinion that a modern and efficient railway passenger system can and should be provided and continue to play an important role in Canada's transportation future.<sup>(2)</sup>

Are we "on the right track" to the achievement of this goal? The Committee believes that some advances have been made in a positive direction but that much more needs to be done. It feels that with proper Government initiatives, sound management practices and necessary powers, VIA Rail Canada Inc. can provide Canadians with a good rail passenger system.

CHANGES IN PASSENGER RAIL SERVICES SINCE JULY 1982

While the Committee heard much testimony on what is wrong with Canada's passenger rail system, it also received testimony highlighting improvements that have taken place since its interim report in July 1982. In testimony presented by the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and by Mr. Pierre Franche, President of VIA Rail Canada Inc., on 21 February 1984, some of these improvements were noted.<sup>(1)</sup> These include:

- the development of a five-year capital program for VIA to better enable it to invest in the improvement of its facilities and services;
- Government funding to VIA Rail of approximately $300 million for the development of four new maintenance facilities to be located at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg to enable it to have better maintenance operations at lower cost;
- with the assistance of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, the Department of Transport announced a $40 million program to develop a new prototype train set for use in the Atlantic provinces and Western Canada;
- consultations in various locations in Canada with a view to restoring some passenger services that were done away with in 1981. This has resulted in the restoration of the Northern Continental Line between Winnipeg and Edmonton with extension to Vancouver via Jasper in the fall of 1985 and a two-year trial program for the Moncton/Edmundston line in New Brunswick;
- the establishment of special fares (e.g., student discounts) and a series of tour packages by VIA Rail;
- a growing climate of cooperation between VIA, CN and CP on common issues;
- the upgrading of a number of railway stations by VIA, the most important being the Gare du Palais in Quebec City (which is leased by VIA);
- discussions by VIA with CN, CP and Transport Canada about a plan to transfer all the key railway stations to VIA's control and management — this has resulted, subject to Treasury Board approval, in VIA signing agreements to buy the Trois-Rivières and Winnipeg stations;
- the delivery of the second order of Light Rapid Comfortable Trains (LRCs) which is expected by early 1985, for service in Central Canada;
- the establishment of a customer service training program for VIA employees to improve service to the public; and
- the completion by VIA of a three-year study on high-speed passenger rail service in Canada's more densely-populated corridors. Subject to detailed engineering and market studies, VIA feels that a high-speed train service could be established in the Quebec-Windsor corridor and be operated at a profit.

The Committee recognizes the value of these efforts and commends the Government and VIA Rail for these actions. However, it also notes that some matters raised in its earlier report have not been addressed and submits that additional major initiatives must be taken if rail passenger services are to be substantially improved. The following sections of this report will deal with those initiatives.

VIA RAIL LEGISLATION

The Committee recommended in its previous report that legislation be enacted to provide VIA Rail Canada Inc. with a clear and all-encompassing statutory framework. This still has not been done.

In the hearings leading to its first interim report, the Committee heard evidence of the positive effects that legislation had in the creation of Amtrak in the United States. This view was reinforced during its recent study of Amtrak's operations. That railroad has a statutory basis with its duties and powers clearly defined. Recent testimony before the Committee again confirmed the fact that VIA is being hampered by the lack of a statutory framework and the mandate that normally accompanies it. This is noted in the following statement by Mr. Garth Campbell, former Vice-President of Passenger Marketing at CN Rail, before the Committee when he was outlining some of the problems he felt were facing VIA Rail.

However impressive the foregoing list of problems is, by far the most critical in my opinion was the first one. The mandate which VIA inherited when it was created was never written, never debated in Parliament and never really defined. It did not spell out VIA's obligations nor its authorities. It did not define the operating railways' obligations in return for being relieved of the financial burden of the passenger business. Lastly, it gave the public no clues as to what it ought to expect in terms of service.

This mandate would normally have been spelled out in legislation and the abiding question in many minds is why this was never done — as for example when Amtrak was formed. At the time, everyone was so glad to see anything happen that they settled for what they could get — a schedule "D" crown corporation fashioned out of Adam's rib! It may have been however, that the basically pessimistic view of the government concerning the future of rail service, gave rise to great reluctance to introduce legislation and to say just what VIA was all about. I now believe that the reason may be simplicity itself, as obvious as the proverbial nose on one's face. To define VIA's role in legal terms when the official attitude was so ambivalent, could have exposed the government or VIA, or both, to very considerable criticism. A forthright indication of the future could have raised an unholy row after the endless pious promises of 1974, 1975 and 1976 to improve and to revitalize the service.<sup>(1)</sup>

VIA Rail has proposed — as it did when it came before the Committee under its first order of reference — that a VIA Rail Canada Act be enacted. Such an Act could provide VIA with a mandate outlining, among other things, what types of services it is expected to provide in the various regions of Canada; how it will be compensated for the provision of services; its rights over tracks and station facilities; and its relationship with the railways as well as the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission. At the present time VIA has to adapt to situations as they arise without having a clear picture of what its position is or what its role in providing rail passenger transportation is, will or should be.

The Committee finds that VIA Rail now has the responsibility to provide passenger services without the necessary powers and guidelines to carry out this responsibility. Here again we return to the basic question of whether or not we want rail passenger services in Canada. If the answer is affirmative — and the Committee believes it is — then VIA must be provided with the powers necessary to accomplish this goal.

What is essential is that the Federal Government make a basic commitment to passenger rail service. This can best be accomplished by enacting legislation setting out the goals and objectives of both VIA and the Government for such a service. It is one thing to provide ad hoc solutions such as the reinstitution of some services or the funding of maintenance centres to solve some of VIA's problems; however, this still does not provide VIA with a firm and explicit policy on the part of the Government as to what passenger rail services should be for Canada. This can be done only by providing VIA Rail with legitimacy — through the enactment of a VIA Rail Canada Act.

As at the time of its previous report, the Committee believes that the obvious way of achieving this end would be to enact legislation that clearly spells out VIA's responsibilities and powers as well as those of the Government. The Committee also proposes the establishment of a Joint Parliamentary Committee to monitor the effectiveness of the legislation.

Therefore,

1. The Committee recommends that legislation be enacted by the Parliament of Canada at the earliest possible time to establish VIA Rail on its own statutory basis with a mandate to provide a sound and efficient national rail passenger system.
2. The Committee recommends that the ACT include a clear statement of the Government's policy regarding VIA's provision of rail passenger service.
3. The Committee recommends that the ACT include provisions authorizing VIA Rail to own, manage, and operate intercity passenger trains, and/or contract for the operation of passenger trains and, that insofar as it is practicable, VIA Rail shall directly operate and control all aspects of its rail passenger service.
4. The Committee recommends that the ACT include the establishment of specific service commitments for rail passenger services with a time-frame for their implementation.
5. The Committee recommends that the ACT include provisions for VIA Rail to enter into agreement(s) with parties, for the provision of passenger rail services if the need arises.

6. The Committee recommends the establishment of a Joint Parliamentary Committee on transportation to report, within two years of the enactment of the legislation, on the effectiveness of the ACT and to propose any changes it deems necessary.

OPERATING CONTRACTS AND COSTING PROCEDURES

In providing passenger rail services, VIA enters into contractual arrangements with CN and CP for the provision of services such as maintenance of rolling stock, use of tracks and roadbed services such as switching. Much discussion has been heard before the Committee regarding the way in which VIA negotiates these operating contracts with the railways. The observation has been made that VIA is at a severe disadvantage in these negotiations because it does not have complete access to all the costing information from the railways. It has been brought to the Committee's attention that VIA has made good progress during 1983 in obtaining more detailed billing information from the two railways, which has resulted in lower rail charges to VIA. The Canadian Transport Commission (CTC) has also reduced the time it takes in auditing CN/CP charges to VIA Rail. While these improvements are welcomed by the Committee, it still has some concerns in this area.

A. CTC Audit Reports

The audit reports examine the CN/CP charges to VIA Rail in some detail. In accordance with the Minister of Transport's directive of 17 December 1981, which initiated these audits, the CTC provides these reports to Transport Canada, which may then distribute them to CN, CP and VIA.

In testimony by the CTC before the Committee on 22 May 1984, it was noted that CP Rail has objected to the release of the last (1981) audit report of its charges to VIA Rail. As a result VIA is not yet in possession of all relevant costing data. The CTC has recommended that VIA receive the 1981 audit report and the Committee agrees with this recommendation. Subject to keeping this data confidential, VIA should be given access to this and all subsequent audit reports of both operating railroads.

B. The 13th and 14th Bills

The Committee's concerns regarding the 13th and 14th bills that were raised during the Committee's hearings in 1981-1982, while somewhat alleviated, still exist. VIA Rail still receives monthly bills from CN and CP for the services they provide to VIA under the operating contracts. In addition, the contractual arrangements provide for the presentation to VIA of a 13th bill or yearly statement of adjustment charges to be paid to the railways in addition to the expenses billed in the monthly statements. This bill is a catch-up bill after the 12 monthly bills have been processed and includes charges that may not have been foreseen (e.g., switching charges) or correctly estimated in the monthly bills.

VIA Rail is also presented with a 14th bill. This represents a final adjustment figure which the operating railways can charge VIA after their charges have been audited by the CTC. While VIA has been better able to forecast what these bills will amount to (VIA received a credit in excess of $5 million for overpayments to the railways for their services in 1982), they are still faced with the fact that they are not sure what their final costs for services will be under the operating contracts until well after the operating year ends. It would seem desirable where possible to have VIA Rail aware of the costs it is going to incur before such services are performed. This would allow VIA to have an improved budget process and more financial control over its operations. The Committee is still of the opinion that a contractual arrangement should be established that does away with a 14th bill.

C. Costing Methodology — The Amtrak Approach

1. Short-term Avoidable Costing

The subject of costing methodology within the operating contracts was also examined by the Committee. In its study of Amtrak's operations, it reviewed the contrasting approaches to costing methodology.<sup>(1)</sup> Amtrak uses the concept of short-term avoidable costs in its operating contracts with the railway companies. That is to say, Amtrak pays costs that the railroads would have avoided incurring if no passenger trains were operated. This is in contrast to the procedure imposed on VIA Rail by costing Order R-6313 whereby it pays long-term avoidable or allocated costs:

Allocated costing methodologies may use inflated overheads to cover supervisory costs, corporate overheads, profit factors or other costs not specifically identified. Such overheads may be significantly greater than actual avoidable costs. Amtrak pays only avoidable costs, such as the actual cost of employee health and welfare benefits, as well as actual vacation and holiday pay.

Amtrak does not pay for other items which potentially could involve significant costs, such as the use of tracks and facilities, opportunity costs, return on investment and ownership costs.<sup>(2)</sup>

The costing methodology is a critical factor in VIA's financial operations because approximately 60% of its total expenses each year are payments to the railways under the operating contracts. Amtrak believes it saves a considerable amount of money by using the short-term avoidable costing methodology in negotiating its operating contracts, and estimates that since 1976 these savings have been in excess of $30 million annually. The question arises, how much could VIA save if a similar costing methodology were used? In testimony before the Committee, the CTC stated that the costs to VIA would be lower under the U.S. costing system.

The system used in the United States would produce costs somewhat lower than the cost levels that we are assessing. There is some argument between VIA and ourselves regarding exactly how much lower they would be. We have suggested that it is in the ballpark of $25 million to $35 million less in terms of the U.S. system. VIA claimed, at one time, that it was as much as $55 million, but I have not seen any justification for that claim. I believe our figures of $25 million to $35 million are reasonably accurate.<sup>(1)</sup>

This fact was noted in its first report and the Committee is still of the opinion that there would be substantial savings to VIA Rail if a short-term avoidable costing methodology were implemented in Canada. In other words, VIA Rail should only pay the actual costs of the railways in operating passenger trains.

2. Determination of Costs and Payments

Another significant difference between VIA and Amtrak lies in how the appropriate costs and payments are determined. This is highlighted in the following quotation.

The question which logically follows the costing methodology is, "How are the appropriate costs and payments for same determined?" The answer is that Amtrak has complete access to the carriers' financial and operational records, not only for post-audits of billings and payments, but also for detailed studies prior to negotiating a new contract. This is the most significant difference between Amtrak and VIA's respective rights to determine what appropriate charges should be.

After conducting actual cost studies using the carriers' records, operating contracts are negotiated with each railroad covering the actual services to be provided, the staffing levels required for each category of employees, and to the maximum extent possible, flat rates are negotiated for each service.

It is also significant that Amtrak has the right to negotiate directly with the carriers, as well as the right to audit the carriers' operational and financial records without having to act through an intermediary.<sup>(2)</sup>

The subject of Amtrak's access to the operating railways' financial and operational records with full audit privileges was of particular interest to the Committee. As noted earlier, VIA does not have complete access to the railways' costing data and therefore cannot audit the railways' records. The Committee concludes that this places VIA in a very difficult position in negotiating operating contracts.

3. Flat Rate Costing

An important aspect of Amtrak's contracts is that they are based on a flat rate or fixed price costing concept where each costing element is paid for at a fixed monthly rate to the maximum extent practicable. Amtrak feels that this promotes efficiency and cost controls because once the rate is agreed to, inefficiencies are borne by the carrier. On the other hand, if the carriers can reduce costs by being more efficient, they can pocket the savings. The contracts also allow for amendments to be made to take into account such things as changes in the level of services provided and wage adjustments. Finally, Amtrak pays incentives to the railways for on-time performance and has penalty provisions for poor performance. The Committee believes this type of contract could eliminate the need for the 13th and 14th bills and would promote efficiencies within the operating railroads.

It bears noting that if Amtrak and a railway fail to agree on satisfactory terms for the operating contract, Amtrak can appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) to arbitrate the dispute. This provides both parties with an impartial body to resolve the dispute. It also provides an incentive for both parties to reach an agreement rather than having one imposed upon them.

To sum up, Amtrak believes that the most significant differences between its and VIA's costing methodologies are the right to audit the carriers' financial and operational data, and the use of short-term avoidable costs, as opposed to longer-term avoidable or allocated costs.

D. Changes to VIA's Contractual Arrangements

The Committee believes that Amtrak's contractual arrangements and costing procedures offer important improvements over the current contractual arrangements under which VIA Rail operates. Amtrak does not have to predict about "13th" or "14th" bills because it already knows what its costs will be for a given year. The fact that VIA Rail does not have complete access to the costing data of the railways is unacceptable to the Committee.

VIA Rail has no formal mechanism whereby it can have contract disputes arbitrated by an independent third party except through the judicial system. This can cause lengthy delays in having contracts finalized and provides little incentive to the parties to come to a mutual agreement within a reasonable time.

By not knowing some of the railways' costs, VIA is negotiating in a vacuum and using an intermediary, the CTC, to verify costs it should have a right to know. The time has come to make VIA Rail an equal partner in contract negotiations.

7. The Committee recommends that under the ACT, VIA Rail be given the power to negotiate operating contracts with the railways employing the concept of short-term avoidable costs and that in the event of failure to reach a satisfactory voluntary agreement, VIA Rail shall have the right to appeal to the CTC for arbitration.

8. The Committee recommends that the operating contracts between VIA Rail Canada Inc. and the railways be based on a flat rate costing methodology where each costing element is paid for by a fixed monthly payment to the maximum extent possible — with provisions for amendments to allow for changes in such items as wages and the level of services.

9. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail, in order to better negotiate contracts, be given the right to complete access to the railways' financial and operational records, for detailed studies prior to negotiating a new contract, including post-audits of billings and payments.

10. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail Canada be required by law to keep all costing data confidential.

11. The Committee recommends that until such time as these contract and costing recommendations have been implemented, VIA Rail be given full access to the 1981 CTC audit report of CP service charges to VIA Rail and all subsequent audit reports of both operating railroads.

SUBSIDIES FOR PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE

A. Competition

Testimony before the Committee suggested that because VIA Rail is heavily subsidized, it provides unfair competition to other public carriers.<sup>(1)</sup> The heavy outlays of capital for equipment and for service improvements in the Quebec City—Windsor corridor were cited as an example of this. The Committee is of the opinion that all major transportation forms are subsidized to some extent and notes the vast sums of public money that have been expended on the building of airports, highways and harbours. The bus companies contend that highways were built mainly for automobiles and trucks and would exist with or without bus traffic. They also contend that they pay their fair share of highway costs through licence fees and fuel taxes and therefore that their operations are not subsidized. The Committee has reservations over these contentions.

12. The Committee recommends that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, or the Joint Parliamentary Committee (referred to in recommendation 6) conduct, at its earliest possible convenience, a complete study into the subsidy question with the view to determining how much the various transportation modes are subsidized. This study would determine whether or not one mode has an unfair competitive advantage over another mode and cite recommendations to redress any inequities.

B. Cost Recovery

A recurring theme in discussions on Canadian passenger rail transport is the level of federal subsidy it receives in relation to the amount recovered through passenger fares. The 1983 operating subsidy to VIA Rail was $451 million, approximately 2.6 times the $173.3 million it received in passenger revenues for that year. This is well below the $527.3 million VIA Rail estimated it would require for 1983. VIA stated in its Annual Report for 1983 that the major factors contributing to this reduction were the decline in inflation and the commitment by VIA's Board and management to a philosophy that espouses the least-cost approach to providing services.

While this reduction in subsidy is significant, VIA Rail is still being heavily subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. In addition, VIA is never sure how much subsidy it will require from year to year. In any given year it could be required by the Government to operate trains on low density routes that require heavy subsidies. The Committee believes that consideration should be given to what the level of Government subsidy should be for rail passenger services. In its study of Amtrak<sup>(1)</sup> the Committee noted that Congress requires that Amtrak recover a certain percentage of its costs through revenues. Congress requires Amtrak to have a revenue-to-cost ratio of 50% by 1985 — a target which Amtrak has already attained. At the present time there is no such requirement for VIA. VIA should be made aware of how much subsidy it will receive from the Government and how much it will be expected to recover through its operations; in essence, how much the taxpayer will pay versus how much the users will pay. This is an attempt to isolate what the federal commitment is to passenger rail transport. Special subsidy provisions should be established to cover services deemed to be in the national interest that VIA must provide even if heavy losses are incurred. The Committee believes that once this commitment is known, VIA will be able to establish its priorities within a sound economic framework.

13. The Committee recommends that, within a VIA Rail Canada Act, appropriate levels of subsidy be established together with the attendant levels of service that should be provided by VIA Rail.

PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE

As noted earlier in this report, VIA Rail and the Government have taken a number of initiatives to improve service and equipment. For example, studies are underway on prototype trains or completed on high-speed corridor rail service that are intended to improve VIA's operations. While the Committee applauds these efforts to modernize a national rail system that has suffered from years of neglect, it would be remiss if it did not point out some aspects in this area that require attention.

A. Maintenance Centres

The announced establishment of new maintenance centres at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg should help both to improve VIA's reliability and to give it more control over operating expenses. However, the question of how much control VIA will have over these centres remains to be determined. While VIA will own the maintenance centres, it will not have complete control over the work that will be carried out at these facilities particularly if the policy of contracting out to CN is continued. A recent announcement by VIA and CN stated that they have an agreement in principle to transfer hundreds of CN employees to VIA Rail. However, it was stressed that this will take considerable time because lengthy negotiations are still required between the companies and the unions before formal transfer agreements are concluded. If this transfer comes about, then VIA will gain full control of the maintenance facilities and complete control over the work that is done in them. This, VIA contends, would result in a drop in its costs because it would administer its own work force and be able to determine exactly the work to be done. Consequently, the Committee is of the opinion that VIA and CN should endeavour to hasten this transfer of maintenance employees.

14. The Committee recommends that in order for VIA Rail to have complete control over its maintenance facilities, the work done in them, and the costs incurred in such work, consideration be given to having VIA Rail employees carry out such duties. This may involve the transfer of employees and/or the hiring of new employees.

B. Railcar Rebuilding

The Committee was favorably impressed by Amtrak's rail car rebuilding facility while touring the plant at Beech Grove, Indiana. Amtrak has taken a fleet of rail cars it inherited in the early 1970s and has completely rebuilt many of them from the wheels up, including converting them from steam to electric power. This was done for approximately half the cost of acquiring new cars. VIA Rail testified that it is studying the feasibility of rebuilding some of its heritage rail cars but has not yet made a decision on this matter. It was also noted in this hearing that the new maintenance centres are not intended for rail car rebuilding. The Committee believes that considerable savings can be attained by VIA by rebuilding rail cars, including converting them from steam to electric power. This in turn would help to ease the equipment shortages that have been experienced on some routes and would end the delays due to frozen steam pipes that have occurred in extremely cold temperatures, as was the case in December 1983.

15. The Committee recommends that the rebuilding of heritage rail cars, including the conversion from steam to electric power, be undertaken by VIA Rail in order to upgrade equipment and increase the usable inventory of the railway especially for use in off-corridor service. Consideration should also be given to establishing a facility where this work could be done by VIA Rail employees under direct control of VIA rather than being contracted out.

16. The Committee recommends that in addition to the rebuilding of heritage cars, the program to develop a prototype train set for use in Western Canada and Atlantic Canada proceed with the greatest possible dispatch. The car rebuilding program should not be viewed as replacing the need for new equipment for off-corridor use but rather as an interim measure until new equipment is developed.

C. Priority of Passenger Trains

As was the case in the hearings leading up to the Committee's first interim report, complaints were voiced that passenger trains do not always receive priority over freight trains and are often shunted into a siding (i.e., "taking the hole") until the freight train passes. The reason given for this by the operating railways is that in some instances the sidings are too short to accommodate the longer freight trains and therefore the passenger trains have to "take the hole" until the freight passes.<sup>(1)</sup> While the operating railways stated that this does not occur often, it does happen to some extent — especially in the busy corridor between Vancouver and Calgary. The Committee, while recognizing that this may not be a frequent occurrence, also realizes that any delays, especially lengthy ones, result in a loss of passenger confidence in VIA Rail and ultimately turn people away. Because of this, the Committee recommends that consideration be given to lengthening sidings to accommodate longer freights and thus to allow passenger trains the priority to which they are entitled.

It also believes that provisions should be established in a VIA Rail Canada Act that would allow for a system of incentives and penalties. In other words, the operating railways would be paid incentives for providing better than standard performance and would be penalized if standards are not attained. The Committee notes that there are now in force on-time performance incentives for some of VIA's key services; however, it believes this should be formalized as part of all operating contracts through the proposed VIA Rail Canada Act.

17. The Committee recommends that railway sidings be lengthened where necessary to handle long freight trains in order to give passenger trains priority when "meets" occur.

18. The Committee recommends that under the ACT, passenger trains be given priority over freight trains in the use of trackage to the greatest extent possible.

19. The Committee recommends that the ACT establishing VIA Rail Canada allow for incentives and penalties to be assessed within the operating contracts between VIA Rail and the railways for attaining (or not attaining) on-time performance standards.

D. Labour

The Committee was pleased to hear from both labour and the management of VIA Rail that improvements in labour relations and employee morale had been taking place during the previous 18 months. The establishment of the customer service training program by VIA Rail, which involves every employee in a course geared to customer service-related activities, recognizes the critical need to provide customers with the quality of service that will attract them to passenger rail transport. VIA appears to be responding to some of the criticisms regarding poor service and is directly involving labour in overcoming these serious problems.

One area that merits study is labour's involvement with VIA's expected introduction of new equipment during the next few years. Labour has expressed the desire to be consulted and to have input into those aspects of the design of new equipment that affect the way they perform their duties in serving the passenger.<sup>(1)</sup> The Committee is of the opinion that since much of VIA's labour pool is in direct contact with the public, they are in a good position to assess the best way to serve the public and what facilities are required to best satisfy their needs.

Another aspect of joint management-labour efforts is the direct input of labour into management. Recent appointments of labour representatives to the Boards of Directors of Crown Corporations are seen by the Committee as an important step in encouraging labour participation in the effective operation of these corporations. This would be especially welcome in the case of VIA Rail which must overcome a number of obstacles, not the least of which has been a poor public image, if it is to become an effective railway company. One element that may aid this process is labour participation on VIA's Board of Directors where it could make contributions to better labour-management relations, could provide knowledge on railway operations and could have a direct input into VIA's future development.

20. The Committee recommends that Labour be actively included in VIA Rail's design and testing of new equipment in order to provide the railway and the customer with the best possible trains.

21. The Committee recommends that a railway labour representative sit on the Board of Directors of VIA Rail in order to provide more direct input from employees for the overall benefit of passenger rail service.

E. Route Development

It was noted by the Committee that a great deal of emphasis has been placed on upgrading rail passenger services in the Quebec City-Windsor corridor during the past two years. Introduction of LRC equipment, upgrading of rail lines, and studies indicating the possibility of high-speed electric trains operating on some sections of the corridor on dedicated track age seem to point to a brighter future for passenger rail service in this region of Canada. The Committee realizes that initiatives have taken place for other areas of the country, including the development of a new prototype train set for Western Canada and Atlantic Canada as well as the reintroduction of two rail passenger services in these regions.

In spite of this, some witnesses before the Committee stated that too much emphasis is being placed on corridor services. They argued that new equipment has actually been placed in service there while studies were only beginning regarding new equipment for the other regions, and that a study has been completed on the future of the corridor while similar steps are years away for the off-corridor regions. They complained that the corridor services are attracting too much of the money and planning activity while little attention is being given to the rest of the country.

The Committee recognizes the need to assure Western Canada and Atlantic Canada that their rail passenger needs will not be neglected. Therefore, the Committee proposes that there be a clear definition by the Government and VIA Rail of what types of services and equipment will be provided in off-corridor areas; the use of rebuilt heritage rail cars on off-corridor lines until new equipment has been introduced; and that consideration be given to the special needs of tourist regions. The Committee believes that the whole question of off-corridor services might best be studied by the Joint Parliamentary Committee (see recommendation No. 6) with its recommendations presented to Parliament at the earliest possible time.

In addition, it is the Committee's belief that in conjunction with the above-noted initiatives, VIA Rail should be required through legislation, to develop and submit to Parliament expeditiously a comprehensive plan for the improvement of all inter-city rail passenger transportation, including route structure, level of service, and types of equipment to be used. This should be done in consultation with the provinces, municipalities and other interested parties. Such a plan should not be implemented without the consent of Parliament and with any proposed route changes or future abandonments occurring only after adequate public hearings have been conducted under the process established by the CTC and in conjunction with the studies of the Joint Parliamentary Committee.

22. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail, under a new VIA Rail Canada Act, be required to develop a comprehensive plan for the improvement of all inter-city rail passenger transportation, including route structure, level of service, and types of equipment to be used. This should be submitted to Parliament expeditiously, with route abandonments subject to CTC approval only after an adequate public hearing process has been completed.

MARKETING FUNCTIONS

The Committee has noted improvements in the marketing of VIA Rail services. The linking of VIA's (RESERVIA) and Air Canada's (RESERVEC) reservation systems now means that accredited travel agents equipped with Reservec terminals have access to Reservia data without the need for a separate terminal. VIA has also been linked with Air Canada's Auto-trav service which groups together information about tour packages offered by a number of companies. This will undoubtedly give VIA Rail broader access in marketing its services.

In spite of these efforts, the Committee thinks that two areas require further attention. These are the number of ticket selling locations and the delays in handling telephone reservations. Regarding the former, the Committee is of the opinion that VIA does not have a sufficient number of locations where tickets can be bought and picked up. For example, restricting the number of locations to only VIA Rail offices and/or the railway station makes it very inconvenient for customers to purchase tickets. It would seem more reasonable to have a large number of travel agencies, as is the case with Amtrak, with the authority to sell and issue VIA Rail tickets. This would alleviate last-minute rushes at the train station and the inconvenience caused for some customers in finding a convenient location to pick up their tickets. The Committee notes that VIA has made moves to increase the number of accredited agencies that sell its tickets and recommends that this practice be expanded in the near future.

On the subject of inquiries and reservations, it has been noted by the Committee that many customers have experienced long delays when trying to reach VIA by telephone. Sometimes they either cannot get through or are put on hold and have to listen to recorded music for an inordinate period of time. In testimony before the Committee, VIA stated that its average response time for telephone calls is 21 seconds.<sup>(1)</sup> This is unacceptable in a business that should be highly sensitive to customer demands. Without this sensitivity, customers lose patience and confidence in VIA Rail. In contrast to VIA, it was pointed out to the Committee that the response time for handling telephone calls by Amtrak averages three seconds and that the average length of time a customer spends making a reservation is slightly over two minutes. This is the type of efficiency VIA should seek to emulate. VIA told the Committee that it is aware of this problem and is trying to remedy it. The Committee believes that this should be done with the greatest possible speed. Moreover, reservation personnel should be fully aware of the types of accommodation available on the various trains.

23. The Committee recommends that VIA Rail institute a policy whereby a larger number of agencies have authority to sell and distribute VIA Rail tickets. One way this could be done is by linking travel agencies to a computer ticketing operation such as is used by Air Canada.

24. The Committee recommends that the telephone inquiry and reservation system that is presently employed by VIA be upgraded.

VIA — AMTRAK SERVICES

An important point that was noted in the Committee's study of Amtrak's operations was VIA's links with the U.S. passenger rail system. At the present time Amtrak and VIA operate services between Montreal and New York and between Chicago and Toronto. Complaints regarding the slowness of trains, poor equipment and scheduling, and high operating costs were voiced to the Committee, especially regarding the Canadian segments of these services. It seems obvious to the Committee that if VIA could upgrade these services it would have access to a large pool of potential customers, both Canadians and Americans, who wish to travel between the two countries. Any improvements in this direction would enhance VIA's profile and credibility and expand its passenger markets.

One other item which VIA may wish to take note of is Amtrak's desire to initiate a passenger rail service linking Minneapolis with Winnipeg. Amtrak would like to operate one train from Minneapolis to the Canadian border, connecting there with a VIA train from Winnipeg. The Committee is of the opinion that if VIA could implement such a service it would gain access to the mid-western U.S. markets. It suggests that VIA conduct the appropriate studies and market analysis.

25. The Committee recommends that, in consultation with Amtrak, VIA Rail actively undertake studies to improve and expand rail links and/or joint services between Canada and the United States.

RESTORATION OF PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES

As was noted in the Committee's first interim report, through the implementation of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 dated 6 August 1981, 20% of VIA Rail's passenger routes were eliminated. These reductions and abandonments, which were referred to by the Minister of Transport as a "rationalization" of passenger rail services, involved the elimination of some important train services.<sup>(1)</sup> The legal basis of the Order in Council used is found in section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act, which allows the Governor in Council to vary, at any time, any order or decision of the CTC. This Order "varied" (i.e., it ended some train services) a number of CTC decisions between 1976 and 1981 regarding the provision and frequency of passenger train service on various routes. By using an Order in Council to reduce and abandon services, the Government avoided public hearings or inquiries by the CTC. If the normal procedure had been followed in applications for abandonments or service reductions in accordance with section 260 of the Railway Act, the CTC would have considered all matters that, in its opinion, are relevant to the public interest in determining whether or not a service should be eliminated. This was not done, and the Committee registered its displeasure with the Government's use of Section 64(1) in these instances to by-pass the CTC. It recommended that the application of this section be restricted by amendments to other sections of the National Transportation Act to ensure that reductions in passenger services come under full scrutiny of the CTC or Parliament. The Committee still believes that regardless of the legality of what was done in these instances, consideration of the public interest is a vital element in determining whether or not a rail service should be abandoned and must be considered by the CTC in its public hearing process.

During the current hearings the Committee again heard testimony concerning some of the services that were discontinued under the 1981 Order in Council. Specifically, testimony from witnesses called for the restoration of passenger train services on: the Edmonton-Jasper-Vancouver route in Western Canada; the Montreal-Mont-Laurier route in Central Canada; and the Nova Scotia-southern New Brunswick-Eastern Townships-Central Canada direct route ("The Atlantic Ltd.") linking Atlantic Canada and Central Canada. In the case of the western route, the Committee is pleased to note that the Minister of Transport has recently announced that VIA Rail will extend service from Edmonton to Vancouver via Jasper beginning in the fall of 1985 on a five-year trial basis. However, no mention has been made yet regarding the other two services.

The Committee is still of the opinion that restoration of services in these other regions should have merited more serious consideration, especially in view of the fact that their abandonment was not subject to the public hearing process of the CTC. There was no official forum for supporters of these services to voice arguments for retention. In the case of the Montreal-Mont-Laurier rail line, which runs north from Montreal to Mont-Laurier for approximately 160 miles, testimony showed that the region once served by a passenger railway is a centre for tourism and growing manufacturing activities (e.g., General Motors at Ste-Thérèse and Bell Helicopter at Mirabel) as well as being a satellite region of Montreal and requires an efficient mix of transportation services to attain its true potential. With the bus being the only public transport available, the region is subject to a monopoly situation. For these reasons, the Committee believes that every consideration should be given to the restoration of this line, with connections to Amtrak in Montreal. This important industrial and tourist region would then be linked to the northeastern United States.

The restoration of train service between Central and Atlantic Canada on the most direct route is of concern to the Committee. This service, commonly called the "Atlantic", linked Nova Scotia and southern New Brunswick through the State of Maine to the Eastern Townships and Central Canada. This route was dropped in favour of the more circuitous route served by the "Ocean Limited" which links Atlantic Canada and Central Canada via the St. Lawrence Valley and the north shore of New Brunswick. Strong representations have been made to the Committee by concerned civic, municipal and other organizations, in addition to hundreds of appeals from individuals, for the restoration of the "Atlantic". In conjunction with these interventions, a number of convincing arguments were made before the Committee by the Coalition for Improved Rail Passenger Service (CIRPS) for the restoration of the service.<sup>(1)</sup> These included:

- a reduction in the distance travelled between Central Canada and the Maritimes (e.g., a passenger travelling from Fredericton to Montreal travels 752 kilometres by the direct Atlantic route versus 1,295 kilometres by the Ocean Limited route — a savings of 543 kilometres);
- a reduction in the number of delays that are now encountered on the Ocean Limited because of the long trains used on this route which result in longer station stops and failure to make scheduled connections at Moncton;

- an end to the inconvenience experienced by passengers who are put on stand-by lists and/or who cannot always book sleeping accommodation on the Ocean Limited;
- an end to the higher fares passengers from southern New Brunswick have to pay because of the longer distances on the Ocean Limited's route;
- the provision of VIA Rail service to Sherbrooke, Quebec, which is one of the few locations of its size in Canada without rail or regular air service; and
- the development of a considerable tourist market by linking the State of Maine with direct service to Central and Atlantic Canada.

For these reasons and to end the extreme hardships that have been experienced by people in the Maritimes because of the loss of the direct train through southern New Brunswick, CIRPS has urged the restoration of the "Atlantic" at the earliest possible time. It suggests that a restructured service be established, with the Ocean Limited operating from Montreal to Halifax on its St. Lawrence Valley-North Shore route and with the "Atlantic" providing direct service from Montreal through Sherbrooke, Quebec, to southern New Brunswick to Halifax. The Ocean and Atlantic could run as one train between Moncton and Halifax.

In conjunction with its study and proposals for restoration of the Atlantic service, CIRPS undertook an exhaustive costing analysis of its plan.<sup>(1)</sup> It suggests that no greater subsidy would be required to operate both the Atlantic service and the Ocean service than is now needed. This is due to the fact that first, ridership would increase and second, that costs would be lower on the shorter Atlantic route. In its testimony before the Committee, CIRPS noted that its costing analysis had been under study by VIA Rail and the Department of Transport and that it had received confirmation from the Department that its analysis was highly accurate and that the proposal could work.<sup>(2)</sup>

CIRPS viewed the abandonment of the "Atlantic" in 1981 and the attempt to link Central and Atlantic Canada with one train as an experiment that did not work. It stated that acceptance of its proposal is consistent with Department of Transport policy that VIA Rail "has to service the transportation needs in Atlantic and Western Canada" and that "there is every reason to restore service if a review finds demand has increased or that the communities have suffered as a result of lost service".<sup>(1)</sup> It is the opinion of the Committee that these policy criteria have been met and that the public interest would best be served if the "Atlantic" were to be restored without further lengthy reviews.

26. The Committee recommends that the Atlantic Limited linking Central Canada through Sherbrooke, Quebec, and southern New Brunswick to Halifax be restored immediately.

CONCLUSION

While the Committee requires some additional time to complete its investigations into the questions of costing, subsidies and provision of regional rail services and to make a final report, it is of the opinion that it has sufficient information to conclude that the Government has not given to VIA Rail enough power and control over its operations to fulfill adequately its responsibilities. Basically, this is because the Government has not clearly defined its commitment to rail passenger services. As a result, and as is evident throughout this report, the Committee believes that VIA Rail must have the necessary authority to meet its responsibilities and therefore strongly recommends that VIA be given the requisite legal powers to do so. Implementing many of these recommendations will require the enactment of legislation. The Committee does not believe that any further delays in providing VIA with its own Act should be tolerated, and to do so will only aggravate VIA's problems.

Returning to the title of this report, the Committee is convinced that passenger rail transport will be on the right track if the Government defines its commitment and if the recommendations of the Committee are implemented without any delay. In making these recommendations the Committee is of the firm conviction that it is fulfilling its Senate role as the representative of the various regional interests of all Canadians and believes that it is essential for the national interest that Canadians have at their disposal, an efficient passenger rail system from coast to coast.

THE SENATE

REPORTS DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

In the event of an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week, the following Senate Committees be authorized to publish and distribute their reports with respect to their orders of reference as soon as the reports become available, namely,

(a) The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to its Order of Reference dated 19th January, 1984, relating to its examination of Canadian relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa;

(b) The Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence, with respect to its Order of Reference dated 17th January, 1984, relating to matters of national defence;

(c) The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to its Order of Reference dated 13th March, 1984, relating to its examination of the role of the Federal Government in generating economic development through technological change;

(d) The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, with respect to its Order of Reference dated 7th February, 1984, relating to its examination of the subject-matter of soil and water conservation throughout Canada.

In the event of a prorogation or a dissolution of Parliament, the Honourable Senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions or between Parliaments be empowered to authorize the publication and distribution of any Report of the above-mentioned committees requiring no further activity by the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion, with reference to an adjournment of more than one week's duration, is to enable those committees which have been working for some time on reports which have reached a mature stage to continue that work during the adjournment, and, if necessary, to authorize the intersessional committee to approve expenses for those reports.

In the event of prorogation or dissolution of Parliament, of course, all committees are automatically out of business and have no authority to meet. In each such case their budgets lapse. The words "in the event of a prorogation or a dissolution" are added because the only authority that would be given to the intersessional committee would be to authorize expenditures for reports that require no further activity of the committee. For example, if a committee held a series of meetings, completed its report, sent its report to the printer—no further activity being required from the committee—the intersessional committee would be authorized not to allow the report to die at the printers, in effect.

Honourable senators, that is the reason for this motion. The first part of it is quite normal in the sense that it has been done quite often in the past, but I wanted to provide an extra explanation with respect to dissolution or prorogation because there is a more real possibility of such an occurrence this summer than there has been at other times.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make one observation with respect to the wording "an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week." The Senate often adjourns for one or even two weeks. It seems to me that the motion should specify an adjournment of a month. Let us say that the Senate adjourns this Friday until September. That adjournment would be for more than a month and we would then know that it is for that reason that the intersessional committee would be authorized to do what is permitted under this motion.

My second point is with reference to prorogation. We have long given up the practice of proroguing at the beginning of the summer recess. Now we always prorogue the session on the eve of the beginning of the next session. So I do not think it means anything. Dissolution, of course, raises a problem. The so-called intersessional committee would have the power to authorize committees to publish their reports, but it is doubtful that they would in the event of a dissolution. No one would complain because eventually we could ratify the decision; in fact, decisions of the intersessional committee have been endorsed when a new Parliament has convened following an election. Prorogation means nothing much, and dissolution is rather doubtful legally. However, with those remarks, I will not mind the motion's being adopted, but the next time that we are sitting on the government benches maybe we will draft it in a better way.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with the "maybe".

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before the debate on this motion is concluded, I should like to say that I share some of the apprehensions of my leader as to what should happen after dissolution. It seems to me a rather questionable proposition that the intersessional committee should be acting in that interval, even though I have been told it is a precedent that has been accepted. It seems to me that to give authority to publish and distribute raises some questions. Customarily, reports are submitted to the Senate first, or at the same time as they are published, and I am old-fashioned enough to think that is a good idea. But even if I am wrong and it is decided that they should be distributed after the period of dissolution, what happens to the public relations, to the information content of those reports? In my opinion, it is not good enough simply to slap the thing on the table some place and say, "This is it." We usually have press conferences; we have a discussion, and committee members are asked to say something about a particular report. People who are not on the committee sometimes say something, either favourable or unfavourable, about it.

There is another process that surrounds these reports once they are released to the public. That has to do with the distribution and transmission of the information. The real purpose of the exercise is to provide leadership, or a set of facts, or an opinion, or education—whatever you want to call it—for those of the general public who are interested in the question at issue. It seems to me that to allow these documents to be published after dissolution, when there is no real opportunity—for a certain period of time, at any rate—to undertake any of these other activities is a doubtful move. While I am not prepared to oppose the motion at the present time, I hope that the intersessional committee will take those factors into account; and if a committee chairman wants to submit a report to the public after dissolution, then some arrangements should be made to overcome the particular problem to which I have referred.

Senator Frith: On a point of order. This is a substantive motion. Therefore, if I speak, I will be closing the debate—

Senator Flynn: You are simply replying to a question. You are not closing the debate. We will even give you an opportunity to speak later.

Senator Frith: I thank the honourable senator. Since this motion results from a request by the chairmen of the committees, perhaps they wish to speak before I close the debate. It is also subject to the caveat that the intersessional committee should bear in mind the comments made by honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Without enthusiasm.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA

Hon. George van Roggen, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on January 19, 1984, to examine and report upon Canadian relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa, be empowered to travel from place to place in Canada for the purpose of such examination.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion is worded in the usual fashion but is designed for one purpose only. Because of the illness of one committee member, and for the convenience of a majority of members, we are seeking authority to meet in a city other than Ottawa for the purpose of concluding the work of our report in camera.

Motion agreed to.

ABORIGINAL ISSUES

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That Rule 66(1)(b) be suspended in relation to the nomination of Senators to serve on the Special Committee of the Senate on Aboriginal Issues; and

That the following Senators be appointed to act on the said Special Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Adams, Bielish, Gigantès, Kirby, Marsden, Steuart and Watt.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, we have great problems on this matter and we are not ready to go ahead.

Senator Frith: Then, honourable senators, I give notice that I will move this motion at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE LEGISLATIVE DOCKET

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I believe that, pursuant to its Standing Orders, the House of Commons must adjourn for the summer recess this coming Friday at 5 p.m. until approximately September 10. Yet, we are receiving from the other place a great many bills which were hastily passed and which, in turn, we must pass with similar haste. In the interest of all honourable senators, could the deputy leader indicate to us just how many bills we are expected to deal with by the time the House of Commons adjourns for the summer on Friday? At this rate, the Senate might have to sit next week. I understand that, because of its Standing Orders, the House of Commons may not sit past this Friday, but nevertheless its members may be invited by their Speaker to return for the Royal Assent.

I think a number of senators would like to know how things stand and what is likely to happen between now and next Friday at 5 p.m.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will understand that I cannot speak for the house leaders of the other place.

Senator Flynn: You can speak for at least one of them.

Senator Frith: I can speak for one of them but not on this subject because, according to our rules, as of tonight any legislation that comes to us will require leave to be dealt with this week. However, I have been making inquiries and, if I can use the metaphor, the legislative sands of the other place are shifting almost from moment to moment, because there is no time left under their rules for time allocation, so everything has to be done by negotiation and consent.

● (1430)

Bills C-5, C-7, C-8 and C-49 were passed yesterday in the House of Commons. They are now on our Order Paper to be dealt with later this day. The latest information I have is that the House of Commons expects to deal with Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and Bill C-34, to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Financial Administration Act.

On Thursday, members of the other place hope to reach agreement on Bill C-32, to establish the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security; Bill C-43, respecting the Canada-Nova Scotia Agreement on Offshore Oil and Gas Resource Management and Revenue Sharing; and Bill C-30, to amend the Bank Act, increasing from 8 per cent to 16 per cent the share of the banking business available to foreign banks.

[Senator Walker.]

Today or tomorrow members of the other place hope to pass Bill C-36, to amend the Interest Act. It is a companion to Bill C-37, to amend the Housing Act. That bill is on the Order Paper for tomorrow at the third reading stage.

That is all the information I have. However, as Senator Flynn implies, my judgment is that we will have to sit Friday.

Senator Flynn: And next week?

Senator Frith: I think we will have to decide on Thursday or Friday whether it will be necessary to sit next week. Since everything requires consent from this point on, it is up to—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Do you think we will receive the legislation with respect to the Labour Code?

Senator Frith: I can only say that members of the other place are hoping that the Canada Labour Code legislation will be dealt with today.

Senator Asselin: How about in the Senate?

Senator Frith: We will have to see. That is a bridge we will cross when we come to it. As I said, everything from this point on requires consent.

Senator Asselin: So we are coming back next week?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: It is in your hands.

Senator Flynn: Unless the new Prime Minister dissolves Parliament in the interim.

Senator Frith: That is possible, too.

Senator Steuart: They might dissolve you, too.

Senator Flynn: I doubt whether he will have that power; but he could put you in your place very easily.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION

PROPOSED COMMEMORATIVE STAMP TO HONOUR SHELDON LUCK

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. Mr. Sheldon Luck, who has been a professional pilot for many years, is being honoured in British Columbia for an historic flight he made on September 5, 1935. Among his many accomplishments, Mr. Luck flew a single-engine Puss-Moth across the Rocky Mountains at night, if you can believe it. It was the first night flight ever across the Rockies by a pilot in a single-engine aircraft. It was quite an achievement.

Mr. Luck was the first chief pilot for CP Air. He is a member of the Aviation Hall of Fame. He received a commendation from King George VI in 1943 for his services with the Transport Ferry Command. He is a famous person in the north and in British Columbia. Many people from those regions have asked that a commemorative stamp be struck on September 5 of this year to honour his feats.

I should like to know whether the minister will undertake to pursue this issue with the ministers responsible in Cabinet to ascertain whether a stamp could be issued to honour Mr. Luck's achievements.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Senator Lucier, I think you have made an excellent case for a large commemorative stamp. I shall undertake to make the appropriate representations and, with your co-operation and assistance, perhaps we can get something done in time.

ITEMS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government, following upon a question that I asked and he replied to yesterday. At that time he said:

With regard to the human rights aspect, I am hoping to have something to say about that after conferring with the authorities who are interested and with the cabinet.

My question is whether the deputy leader now remembers that I spoke on this subject for an hour and a half on February 9 and 10 of 1983, and in that speech I referred to the decision reputed to have been made by Mr. Chrétien, who was then the Minister of Justice. Senator Perrault and I called on Mr. Chrétien and he told us that he had never even heard of the matter. It transpired that some civil servant in his department, without consulting him, had made the unilateral decision as to how the Senate was to conduct its business.

In my speech on March 13 of this year, I pointed out that I had received a letter from Mr. MacGuigan back in June 1983. I pointed out where Mr. MacGuigan was wrong in each argument that he used. I would say to the deputy leader, therefore, that this matter has already been considered by two Ministers of Justice.

Also yesterday, Senator Frith said:

On the third one, which is not as long standing as the other two, immediately after it was raised I asked for a response, particularly from the Department of Agriculture which, I think, among others inspired that concern, but I have not yet received a reply.

This matter had originally been raised in a report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments of July 17, 1980, which was a general report. That is nearly four years ago. I originally spoke on this particular motion on April 1, 1983. Senator Frith spoke on the matter on April 26, 1983, and indicated that some action along this line was possibly about to be taken by the government, and for that reason he did not want to do anything at that particular time but would rather wait for the government's action.

It is now a year and three months since that time and, as yet, nothing has happened. I again spoke on the matter on March 13, 1984. I thought that today I would just refresh my friend's memory on that matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the first point made by Senator Godfrey, yes, I remember that. On the second point, I found that I was in error. I was thinking of the question of those ultra vires regulations with regard to the Department of Agriculture, so I wrongly identified the matter. With respect to that item, I would say to the honourable senator that I do remember his speech on that point.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The Leader of the Government in the Senate made reference the other day to unanswered questions. I would remind him that I am awaiting answers to five questions: one to Senator Austin on December 19, 1983; another one to the same gentleman on January 17, 1984; and another one to the same gentleman on May 10, 1984.

I am also awaiting an answer to a question posed to the Deputy Leader of the Government on February 2, 1984, and another question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board asked on February 14, 1984. If my honourable friend would be kind enough to look up those dates, I would be glad to receive answers to those questions before we adjourn for the summer.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès moved the third reading of Bill C-9, to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact An Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, Senator Kelly, a relatively new senator, made a great contribution to the debate on this matter. His speech of yesterday on Bill C-9 has added to his already great reputation. I recently heard him speak in Toronto before a large crowd which packed the main dining room of the Royal York Hotel. When he concluded that speech, he was so convincing that Bill C-9 should not in any circumstance be passed that he received a standing ovation. It has been years since I have seen anyone receive a standing ovation in that room.

Why we are being pressed to pass this bill is beyond me. The whole matter concerning the involvement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been carefully investigated and no evidence whatever was found other than that certain members of the force, in their over-enthusiasm, occasionally became too rough. However, honourable senators, that was at a time of great crisis in Canada, during 1970 when James Cross was kidnapped and when it appeared we had a revolution on our hands. The members of the force were a little rough at that time, perhaps too rough, but only a few members of the force were involved.

Very notable people investigated that matter for the government and found that there was no evil intent whatever in any actions taken by the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Trouble such as the RCMP had 14 years ago happens in the best run organizations and in the best run police forces.

I am participating in this debate because from 1931 to 1935 I was counsel for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I really became aware of their reputation, the type of people they were, what their commanding officers were like, and how fair they were in every case. They were almost too fair at times, making it difficult to prosecute for them. I feel that we should not pass this bill at the present time or at any time in the future unless there is a need for it, and there is not any need whatever for it at the present time.

It is now 110 years since the force was formed, and the force is associated with Canada all over the world. If one goes to England, one is asked how the members of the RCMP are getting on. Whenever members of the force go over there, huge crowds turn out to see them and to honour them. They are the best in Canadian history; the best in Canadian conduct; and the best in all those things we look up to and honour.

I may be prejudiced because I did act as their counsel for some years, as I said, but I think I am joined by almost everyone else I have talked to when I say that I am at a complete loss to know why this bill should be passed at this time, because there are no facts which warrant our doing so.

Canada and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are really one and the same in what they represent. This bill will completely destroy the RCMP as a great force in Canada. I ask you if, on this paucity of evidence, this scarcity of evidence, scarcity of reason, you are willing to pass this legislation.

As honourable senators are aware, the provincial attorneys general are very much against this bill.

What does this bill do? As set out at page 792 of Debates of the Senate, there is to be a director of an agency who will control the RCMP. He is to be appointed by the Cabinet. That is going to be a political appointment. Can you imagine anything worse than that? The force is to be operated under the control of the deputy minister—more political control because the deputy minister is responsible to the minister. The Inspector General is to be appointed by the Cabinet, another political appointment.

The whole matter, when weighed, shows that this will lead to the disappearance of the famous, independent, marvellously organized, marvellously working force which has done much to make Canada so great.

[Senator Walker.]

To compare the RCMP with the system in the United States is futile. They have no such force in the United States, but wish they had. It is also foolish to compare it with the CIA, because the CIA is an independent body working without the advantages the RCMP has. In other words, no one has shown us any evidence why the RCMP should not carry out its duties as it has done in the past. No one has shown us any reason for this hammer legislation to correct what really amounts to small incidents which could happen no matter how perfect the machinery of any organization might be. I ask you in the greatest of goodwill, thinking of Canada, can you let this thing go by? Why should it be passed at the present time? What reason is there for it? Are we not disgracing ourselves and lowering ourselves at this time by taking unfair advantage of the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a force not used to dealing with politicians and which has done the best it could since 1971 when this came to light? They have done the best they could and have restored their great name. Let's get rid of this bill!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments to make on this matter without taking away from either the comments of my colleague, Senator Kelly, which I have had an opportunity to read, or what Senator Walker has just said. I should like to deal with a couple of items in the legislation that are of particular concern.

As Senator Gigantès said in introducing the bill, this is a matter of national importance and not one which ought to be the subject of partisan politics. For that reason I have no hesitation in standing here today dealing with several items in the bill in a brief manner, because those matters I will deal with have already been before a Senate committee and have been unanimously accepted by the Senate. When I say "unanimously accepted," one must conclude that the government side, which had a few more members on the committee than did the opposition, also endorsed it. I am speaking to honourable senators who have already endorsed this matter. At the conclusion of my brief comments, I will move several amendments in one motion. I should now like to make a few comments on clauses 2 and 12.

There is some concern about the definition section in clause 2 in that it is so broad, and one would have hoped, as Senator Flynn moved in committee, that there might have been an insertion indicating that the reference ought to be:

against or detrimental to the military safety of Canada or activities directed.

Dealing with clause 12, a matter of even greater concern to me is that the words "strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada" are not included.

The question that both the McDonald commission and the Mackenzie commission, ten years earlier, and then the special Senate committee chaired by Senator Pitfield, had to consider was attempting to narrow the scope so that you zero in on those activities that have to be considered because of the security of the country, and that you do not with that same brush wipe out some people engaged in activities that some of us may not like but that do not affect the security of the country, whether it be the protesters against nuclear armaments, at present camped on Parliament Hill, or others. Much has been said to the effect that this kind of legislation must be clear and limiting. I believe this is an attack on those words in clause 2, in the definition section, which refer to "detrimental to the interests of Canada" as being far too broad.

The Attorney General of Saskatchewan, in a brief presented to the House of Commons committee, said the following:

The phrase "detrimental to the interests of Canada" is wide enough to include economic espionage and any other espionage that could be construed as detrimental to our interests and should be limited to the "national security interests of Canada". The offensive aspect of economic espionage should be dealt with by the criminal law.

I could not agree more with that statement.

Dealing specifically with the matter that I raised, that there ought to be reference in the bill to the words "strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada," the position taken by my party is that the service's collection of information and intelligence should be limited to that which is strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada.

The McDonald commission had the best array of talent before it and looked at many aspects of this troubling problem. It concluded, and I am referring to a recommendation at page 443 of the report, as follows:

WE RECOMMEND THAT the legislation establishing Canada's security intelligence agency contain a clause indicating that the agency's work should be limited to what is strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada—

It did not say that in some way wording should be found. The McDonald commission said that those words ought to be in a clause in a bill establishing an agency.

Those of us who sat on the special Senate committee last summer dealing with Bill C-157, the forerunner of C-9, endorsed that commission report recommending in a very serious way that that was mandatory to any legislation. I should like to refer you to page 12 of the report of the Special Senate Committee on a Canadian Security Intelligence Service. That recommendation received the unanimous approval of all members of the committee. Recommendation 30 stated that adding those words:

—would, we believe, have a salutary effect on its interpretation. The recommendation in that Report also went on—to include words which are found in s. 14(3) of the Bill. The Committee is of the opinion that this formulation is also useful, but that it should be expressed affirmatively, and within the definition of security threats, as discussed below.

Recommendation 31 stated:

This, then, brings us back to the question of mandate. Section 2 contains the definition of "threats to the security of Canada". One cannot overstate the importance of this definition. It constitutes the basic limit on the agency's freedom of action. It will establish for the CSIS, its Director, and employees the fundamental standard for their activities. It will enter crucially into judicial determination of whether a particular intrusive investigative technique can be used. And it will provide a benchmark for assessment of agency activities by review bodies, and by the agency's political masters. It will not, however, create a crime or crimes.

Our Senate committee approved that without hesitation and without alteration.

Dealing now with an amendment proposed by Senator Flynn this morning concerning the review on a permanent basis by a committee of the Senate and the House of Commons of the ongoing operations, this particular proposal has been advanced by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Ottawa-Hull Coalition Against the Security Bill, the Canadian Council of Churches, La Ligue des droits et libertés and by Professor Peter Russel of the University of Toronto. Professor Russel, who endorses the bill generally, is highly critical of having this particular provision in it. If one wants to get partisan for a moment, I should like to read a quote from the House of Commons committee in which it was stated:

Mr. Chairman, if there is any group of people that is in touch with the general people in Canada and loyal to the general people of Canada, I would say it is Members of Parliament. I think they would be the last to betray the security of the general interests of Canada.

This was said to meet the argument made by the Solicitor General that one cannot have a review committee when it is a question of security matters that you cannot talk about. After discussing what has gone on in recent history, the speaker said:

I just cannot understand, if we really believe in democracy, why we should disallow an oversight committee, which is allowed in the United States and which was recommended by the McDonald commission. We all know that all sorts of levels of civil servants and exempt staff and everybody else have access to this kind of information. It escapes me; it is completely contrary to all my principles of democracy. I just cannot understand why we cannot have a parliamentary oversight committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is a terrible use of the word "oversight;" it should be "overview."

Senator Nurgitz: Those are the words of Warren Allmand. He is not of my party. He was a Solicitor General in the Liberal government, and that was a case advanced by him. I suppose it is a matter of trust, and it is distasteful to me and to others that there seems to be distrust of members of this house and of the House of Commons and because of this we are not to be able to have an overview.

On that very subject, the special Senate committee made the following recommendation:

111 One final matter should be dealt with. Because legislation in this area will be of such import, and will introduce into the security intelligence system several entirely new elements, we recommend that a parliamentary committee be empowered to conduct a thorough review of the operation of the legislation after a period, perhaps five years, of experience with it. Such a review would go a considerable way toward ensuring that the legislation is working as Parliament intends it to operate.

Those, honourable senators, are the words of your colleagues, including myself, who sat on the special Senate committee.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, since I understand that Senator Frith may wish to speak on the question of clause 16, I shall leave that matter for now.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Kelly:

That Bill C-9 be not now read a third time but that it be amended:

1. in clause 2 by striking out lines 32 and 33 at page 2 and substituting therefor:

against or detrimental to the military safety of Canada or activities directed.

2. in clause 12 by striking out line 3 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

strictly necessary for the purpose of protecting the security of Canada, and analyse and retain

3. a) by deleting clause 16 and renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly;

b) by striking out of clause 21 the words "or to perform its duties and functions under section 16" in lines 19 and 20 at page 11;

c) by striking out of clause 21 the words "or to perform its duties and functions under section 16" in lines 34 and 35 at page 11.

4. By adding immediately after line 32 at page 24 the following:

56. The administration, provisions and operation of this Act shall be reviewed on a permanent basis by a committee of the Senate and House of Commons as may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That Bill C-9 be not now read a third time but that it be amended—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would point out to Senator Nurgitz that the special Senate committee of which I also was a member was referring to something five years down the road. There was a separate problem as to a house committee which would examine the reports each year. I originally thought that there should be a special committee. It was then pointed out to us that under the new rules of the house, when you made a report to the house, as required by the review committee, an appropriate committee could then consider the report and report on it, and the government would have to respond.

There are two separate questions involved: the review five years down the road, and the year-to-year review.

Senator Nurgitz: Briefly, honourable senators, the idea was to have provision for review of the legislation; it was not to take away from the operation of the review committee. I do not want Senator Godfrey to be mistaken on the matter considered by the special committee last summer when the question was: Ought there to be a review committee or ought there to be a parliamentary committee? When discussing the review committee, we talked about its composition including privy councillors, and that is now included in this bill. I am now referring to a review of the legislation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as was mentioned in committee today and as has been pointed out by Senator Nurgitz, the amendment to clause 2 is an attempt to narrow the mandate of the service. It is based on the position that the mandate as now defined is too wide, and that in general the threats with which we should be concerned are only threats against the military safety of Canada. As Senator Flynn pointed out in committee today, his view is that by simply talking about "against Canada" or "the interests of Canada," the definition is too wide.

The whole question of the scope of the mandate was thoroughly discussed in the special committee chaired by the Honourable Senator Pitfield, and in the committee meeting yesterday the minister reported that all of the recommendations for change made by the special Senate committee which dealt with Bill C-157 were, in fact, made except for three.

In any event, this first amendment goes right to the heart of the mandate of the committee, and it is the government's position that the mandate ought not to be so restricted. A great deal of work has gone into defining the mandate as it is now defined in clause 2, and it ought not to be changed. As Senator Pitfield pointed out today in committee, and on other occasions, it is hoped that we can learn from experience. The legislation will be subject to a five-year review. In the meantime, this is a workable and probably the best definition that we can get and it ought not to be restricted by this amendment.

With reference to the amendment to clause 12, as has been pointed out, Bill C-157 did not have the words "strictly necessary for the purpose of—." That was a recommendation of the McDonald commission. The minister and the government accepted the suggestion of the special Senate committee and added the words "strictly necessary".

There is a connection between the proposed amendments to clause 2 and clause 12 because, of course, if the amendment to clause 2 carries, it will have an effect on clause 12. Again, it is the position of the government that the present definition is the most workable. It has been accomplished by dint of long and hard work.

Senator Nurgitz: Wasn't the work done on Bill C-157 long and hard too?

Senator Frith: Yes, and it is the result of a good deal of parliamentary consideration, and yet everyone is not satisfied. I do not find the position taken and as illustrated by these amendments to be totally unreasonable; it is just a matter of a difference of opinion on the question of how wide the scope of the mandate should be.

Senator Kelly's position is a different one; it is that there should not be such a service but that security should be handled by the RCMP.

Senator Walker: Don't you think that too?

Senator Frith: No, I do not, but I have the same respect for Senators Walker and Kelly as everyone in this chamber has. It is just a disagreement on principle. I do believe the principle of separation established by the McDonald commission and by this bill is a principle that ought to be supported, but that, as they say in vaudeville, is another show.

Clause 16 also involves a reference to the mandate. That clause, in a general description, gives the service the authority not just to deal with threats within Canada but to deal with the question of threats from foreign nations. In committee today and in the special Senate committee chaired by Senator Pitfield, Senator Flynn made a strong case that he feels the mandate is too wide. He feels that, for example, it could include, in a particular case, using intrusive techniques to get information, for example, about some group of foreign buyers coming here to buy wheat.

Let us deal with clause 16 itself. The first question we must ask ourselves is: Should the service's authority include such work? Our position is that it ought to. The next question is: Even if the security service has the power provided under clause 16, should it be able to use intrusive techniques to carry out that work? That is, should clause 16 be left in the bill, and, if it is left in, should it not be subject to warrants? The position of the government is that it is subject to the usual protections, those used in connection with all powers that require or include the use of intrusive techniques; namely, the issuing of a warrant, the approval of a judge in order to do so, and the review procedure—that of the review committee and that of Parliament. Therefore, like other clauses dealing with intrusive techniques, it is well guarded by other provisions of the bill.

With reference to parliamentary review and the amendment proposing the inclusion of a new clause 56 and the renumbering of the ensuing clauses, I will say that the difference between clauses 56 and 53 is simply a matter of method and scope. In other words, the proposed section 56 does not create, for the first time in the bill, the principle of parliamentary review. That principle is already contained in the bill by the requirement for the tabling of the report of the review committee each year before each house of Parliament. In essence, the proposed amendment stipulates that there should be a permanent joint committee dealing solely with such matters. As it now stands, according to the rules of the other place, every report is automatically referred to the relevant committee.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not here.

Senator Frith: Not here; one at a time.

Therefore, the reports will be referred to the appropriate committee in the other place. The reports must be tabled here as well and the Senate can, in the same way, refer them to the appropriate Senate committee.

Senator Asselin: What is the guarantee?

Senator Frith: There is no guarantee.

Senator Asselin: There is no guarantee at all.

Senator Frith: I think there is a sufficient guarantee. I cannot imagine any honourable senator not making a good case for the referral of a report to a particular committee. There has never been difficulty in the Senate, since I first came here, in acceding to such a request. There is no reason why honourable senators would refuse such a request in the future, in my view.

Senator Nurgitz: Senator Frith seems to be missing the point. It is an after-the-fact review as opposed to an ongoing review.

Senator Frith: Yes, quite; but the question is not whether there is or is not parliamentary review. The proposed clause 56 suggests a parliamentary review that is virtually the equivalent of that of the review committee. Honourable senators will remember that last summer the Senate committee working on Bill C-157 dealt with this suggestion, and recommended against a permanent parliamentary committee. Clause 53 is the expression of the government's position as to the need for parliamentary review. In light of all of the other review mechanisms, the point is that what is provided in clause 53 is adequate.

Therefore, for the reasons I have given, I ask honourable senators to vote against these amendments.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly on the amendment introduced by Senator Nurgitz. Later on, when we come back to the main motion, I may add a few comments about the bill.

First, I would like to suggest that the amendment we are proposing to insert in clause 56 involves much more than the examination of reports, which Senator Godfrey mentioned.

Senator Frith said that the government does not want a joint committee of both houses to have the power to examine the provisions and the enforcement of this Act.

Senator Frith responded to that and said the annual report would be tabled in the House of Commons. Under the rules of the House of Commons, the report would then be referred to a committee. However, these rules could change. In any case, the rules are not the same in the Senate. The majority could easily prevent the report from being considered.

Our amendment goes much further. It would allow a joint committee to examine the problems which can come up, but not in the same way as the review committee, which will work on a day-to-day basis. The joint committee would need to have something specific to say, but not on a permanent basis. It could only inquire about what is going on by contacting the Inspector General or the Director; this is quite different.

In the second place, we suggest that clause 16 be struck off the bill. I have always found this clause to be nonsensical. It allows the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence to ask the Security Agency to spy by using the means provided for in clause 21; with the use of a warrant, the Federal Court may be made an accomplice to the interception of communications, the theft of papers or anything else, whatever the country and the field involved.

For instance, we mentioned the case of a mission coming in from a friendly country, such as the United States, to purchase wheat. In theory, this is possible, but in practice, I know that it cannot happen. The agency would have the right to obtain a warrant from a judge of the Federal Court to intercept communications or record conversations in a hotel room to know how much the mission was willing to pay for the wheat. With the complicity of the judge, industrial espionage could be authorized.

In the area of defence, for instance, those responsible could say: "We shall authorize you to steal the plans of a mission which has come to Canada to discuss a contract to sell airplanes." The Secretary of State for External Affairs could authorize wiretapping if there were no agreement on a contract. He could ask for authorization to go to a hotel room and steal the plans of a supersonic airplane or whatever.

Imagine the case of a friendly nation such as France, Great Britain or the United States, certainly not an enemy. Under such circumstances, a judge of the Federal Court would become an accomplice to an operation which, under normal conditions, would be deemed illegal and morally wrong. If other countries want to play dirty pool, it is up to them. But it does not make it right as far as we are concerned. It is incredible that in an official bill, we should say to our friends and allies: "As you know, we have legislation which allows us to steal your secrets and spy on you when you come to Canada on business." It is not a matter of national defence or security, but a matter of self-interest. You need only read clause 16: it is all there.

For that matter, the report of the special Senate committee has emphasized that point. I, for one, feel that we are legalizing trade spying on any country, whether friend or foe. That is beyond me. We are therefore suggesting to strike out clause 16, or if we should decide to keep clause 16, there should be at least no warrant requirement, as provided by clause 21 for carrying out this investigation; then, it would make sense.

Once the Security Service has made an application for a warrant, the judge has no choice. The bill states that it can seek a warrant to perform its duties and functions under clause 16. There is no doubt about that.

I conclude by saying that the French version of Senator Nurgitz's motion should be changed slightly; I am saying that for the benefit of our parliamentary reporters. It should read:

à l'article 2 en retranchant les lignes 13 et 14 et en les remplaçant par ce qui suit:

a) L'espionnage ou le sabotage visant la sécurité militaire du Canada ou préjudiciables à celle-ci.

That is how it should read. For the time being, I will leave things as they are, but I may rise again when we are called upon to deal with the main motion, after we have disposed of the motion in amendment.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I mentioned that I would have a few words to say on the main motion. First, I want to explain that we have received this bill at a very late hour, and with only a few days remaining in the normal course of this session and impending dissolution, these are not the most propitious circumstances in which the Senate is asked to consider a very important bill.

The bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and, of course, the question was whether or not the committee would hear witnesses. It decided against the hearing of witnesses for several reasons, the first being that the special committee of the Senate which was constituted last year to consider the subject matter of Bill C-157 had done a good job and that most of its recommendations had been incorporated in Bill C-9.

The second reason was that the House of Commons had carried out a lengthy consideration of the bill in committee and otherwise.

As I mentioned previously, the third reason is that we received the bill at a very late hour. I do not think it would have been possible to have concerned parties appear before the committee. Of course, it would have been possible had the majority agreed to take the risk of allowing the bill to die on the Order Paper as a result of the impending dissolution of Parliament.

Senator Neiman mentioned that several groups had asked to appear before the committee. The Canadian Medical Association was one, as well as La ligue des droits et libertés, which group represents the opinions of individuals, organizations, unions and political parties who have indicated they object to the adoption of Bill C-9 for various reasons.

Hon. Martial Asselin: And Claude Ryan!

Senator Flynn: Yes. However, it would appear from what I have in front of me that Mr. Ryan would have supported the bill. Senator Neiman tells me that there was no letter appended to the documents she received.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Yes, that is true.

Senator Flynn: Nor was there a letter from Mr. Pierre Marc Johnson, who is the Attorney General of Quebec and minister responsible for federal-provincial relations. In any event, it was rather doubtful that any new arguments or points would have been expressed which had not already been expressed either before the special committee of the Senate or the committee of the House of Commons.

Many people have mentioned that Bill C-9 may violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in some respects. Of course, that is possible and, as honourable senators know, I would have restricted the mandate of the agency to matters of strict security. However, there is one sure thing; that is, if the bill offends the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, then the courts will eventually rectify the situation. This, of course, is not a complete answer, nor is it entirely satisfactory.

The main reason we on this side will go along with the vote to be taken at third reading in a few moments is the obvious position of the government majority, which was expressed in committee this morning. At that meeting we tried to put forward all sorts of amendments and not one received one vote from any government supporter.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: As Senator Frith says, "hear, hear". He is always efficient and convincing when he states to the majority that they must oppose any amendment to any government legislation. I have been here for 22 years and I have been Leader of the Opposition for close to 17 years. I have yet to see a majority of the house vote against the wish of either the Leader of the Government, the Deputy Leader of the Government or of the Liberal majority here. That does not come as a surprise.

I wish to mention to those who oppose the bill that I consider we on this side have done everything we could do; however, we have to be realistic. Under the circumstances, we are convinced that we cannot achieve very much by continuing to fight. It is not possible in the Senate for the opposition to filibuster anything, whether or not one is in favour of doing that. Personally, I am not very much in favour of filibustering, but we all know very well that if the government side in the Senate decides that the debate can continue, you can keep us here all night because we have no official hour of adjournment. That has been done before to force a small opposition into submission. Again, I point out that the government has a huge majority, which in fact may be increased by new additions.

Senator Frith: Anyone on this side voting against their party is just about as common as anyone on the other side voting against theirs.

Senator Flynn: But the problem is not the same. The opposition is here to improve legislation and when you have a government such as the one we have had for too long which says, "We are infallible; we are indispensable; we are superior; we can never make a mistake," then of course it is no use. If the majority were able sometimes to just listen to suggestions made by senators on this side of the house to improve legislation, it would be quite a different matter. However, whether we are right or wrong, I know very well that often some senators on the other side of the house come and say to me, "You are right, but we do not want to create any problem for the government. We would never do that." It has never been done in any case. I want to make the point very clear that that is the reason we do not see any purpose in continuing the debate.

I would like to add just a word. I, for one, do not consider that this bill is a condemnation of the RCMP as a result of what the McDonald commission found about their activities. I do not think that it is on that basis that the recommendation has been made for a civilian agency. A good point has been made by Senator Kelly, Senator Walker and other members of our party in the other place, that the RCMP would have been able to continue operating the security agency. What was important was to have legislation covering the activities of either a branch of the RCMP or a new civilian agency concerning security. That will be an improvement in the legislation because at present the branch of the RCMP doing this work is operating under cabinet guidelines that were kept secret for years and years. There was really no control at all over their activities in that field, and so this legislation may cause a little improvement. However, I am very sorry that the government would not accept our suggestions to improve this legislation. For that reason, while we will not prolong debate, we cannot vote for the bill.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I will confine myself to what I hope are just a few basic remarks in principle. I voted for this bill, knowing what I was doing. I think that in general the measures proposed in this bill are necessary for Canada, but I am always worried and apprehensive, from long experience when, however remote, there is some erosion of our basic rights. I know that not everyone is always in agreement on what our basic rights are. I happen to be one who believes that I have the right to read whatever I want to read—that any adult has the right to read whatever he wants to read. But I know that there are others who do not think that that is a basic right.

I refer the house to that ancient cliché, which Lord Acton was not the first to enunciate, that power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely. Let us keep that in mind all the time. On that point, my experience is that if the power is there it is likely to be abused.

I was interested in hearing the submissions by Senator Gigantès yesterday on second reading of this bill. I may be paraphrasing his remarks, but he referred to the need for us to have a police force we trust and respect. I agree with that, but I would also point out that the very fact that the people of Canada are inclined to place almost absolute trust and respect in, for example, the RCMP, led to an abuse of power in some instances. Perhaps not as much as in some other countries and certainly not as much as we have in the country to the south of us, where the CIA and the FBI have repeatedly been shown to have abused their power.

I would like also to repudiate the references I heard on a number of occasions on the need for Canada to make use of "dirty tricks". I am not naive enough to think that you can deal with terrorism or with some of our potential enemies by reciting Sunday school lessons to them, but I repudiate the idea that we have to put ourselves on the same level as some of our potential enemies. If we do that, I think we are in real trouble.

I started with a cliché and I will end with one: The price of freedom is eternal vigilance. Those of us who are parliamentarians, let us watch, with all the vigilance at our command, the implementation of this proposed legislation.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: In the name of accuracy and for the record, I would like to point out to Senator Rowe that Lord Acton did not say that power corrupts; he said that "Power tends to corrupt", which is altogether a different thing.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, about two hours ago I received some documents from the clerk of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I do not know whether other senators in the chamber also received the same documents, but included in that bundle of documents is a letter from the Canadian Medical Association dated June 26, which was yesterday. In that letter the Canadian Medical Association deplores the fact that the House of Commons Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, that studied Bill C-9, did not take into consideration the objections raised by the Canadian Medical Association with respect to the possible lack of safeguards for privacy of information from medical records.

Senator Frith: Senator Haidasz, that committee heard those representations.

Senator Haidasz: Perhaps they did, but our committee did not hear them. The letter does say that the committee of the other place made no changes, but then our committee did not have the opportunity—

Senator Walker: You are completely out of order, Senator Haidasz. The debate is all over; we are about to take a vote and there is no way that you can make this argument at this time.

Senator Haidasz: In that case, I shall ask the Speaker to make a ruling.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, it seems to me that if the point being made by Senator Haidasz is that the committee report should not be accepted, that the matter be referred back to the committee, it might be of questionable order, but he has not spoken on third reading, so he is entitled to speak on whether the bill should be given third reading.

● (1600)

Hon. Martial Asselin: He wants to move an amendment.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have no intention of moving an amendment. My reason for rising is to express my concern that the letter we received from the Canadian Medical Association came two hours after the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had met. For the record I think that someone, either the chairman of the committee or Senator Frith, should allay the concerns of the Canadian Medical Association as to the lack of safeguards for the privacy of medical information as that information relates to Bill C-9.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, copies of the letters and communications to which Senator Haidasz referred were received in my office at approximately 12 noon or 12.30 p.m. today, after the committee had adjourned its meeting and was prepared to report the bill without amendment. I did have photocopies of those letters and communications made for and circulated to the members of the committee so that they would be aware of those concerns.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to say that I do not accept for a minute what the revered Leader of the Opposition has said; that is, that the opposition is here to improve the government's legislation. I say that the whole of the Senate is here to improve the government's legislation, and apart from the Leader of the Government in the Senate and other senators who are members of the ministry, we all have that duty. I am under no compulsion whatsoever to support either the opposition or the government. We are all here to improve the legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

RADIATION EMITTING DEVICES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Radiation Emitting Devices Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-5, to amend the Radiation Emitting Devices Act, was debated in the House of Commons and was thoroughly studied by their Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. May I give honourable senators some explanation and a little history of this legislation?

When I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1970, I had the privilege of piloting the original bill through the House of Commons. Today, after 14 years of experience, we are seized with this bill which makes five major changes. Most importantly, it provides for the establishment of standards for radiation emitting devices and prohibits the sale and importation of such devices unless they comply with the prescribed standards. Standards have now been prescribed for television sets, dental X-ray equipment, microwave ovens, baggage inspection X-ray devices, laser scanners, ultrasound therapy devices, diagnostic and therapeutic X-ray equipment.

The need for radiation protection is important and vital. That is so because exposure to radiation can result in deleterious effects that manifest themselves not only in the exposed individuals but in their descendants as well. Furthermore, the public is exposed to various forms of radiation from an increasing number of industrial and consumer products. For example, medical X-ray exposure accounts for more than 90 per cent of the total exposure received from man-made sources. Nevertheless, X-rays are an essential part of present-day medical practice.

The purpose of this bill is to correct limitations in the Radiation Emitting Devices Act in order to protect the public in a better way and more comprehensively against hazards to their health resulting from the sale and use of unsafe radiation emitting devices.

The amendments contained in Bill C-5 will, for example, extend control over devices for which standards are applicable at the time of importation or lease. At the present time, standards established under the Radiation Emitting Devices Act regulations apply only to devices manufactured after the date of coming into force of regulations for those devices. Radiation emitting devices manufactured outside of Canada prior to that date can continue to be imported indefinitely for sale in Canada even though they do not conform to the standards and may be potentially hazardous to Canadian users. Manufacturers outside of Canada are aware of this weakness in the act and could exploit it by producing and stockpiling for sale in Canada devices manufactured under less stringent conditions.

A further change to this act is the extension of control to devices for which standards have not been prescribed and which are defective or create a risk of injury to the health of the user. At the present time, new types of radiation emitting devices can be introduced in Canada without any prior knowledge or evaluation by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Such devices can be ineffectual for their intended purpose, or totally unnecessary and even detrimental to the safety of the Canadian public, and yet they can still be sold without restriction until standards are developed and promulgated after a lengthy process.

Also, the amendments prohibit false or misleading representation with respect to the design, construction, performance or safety of radiation emitting devices. Under the current act, there are no such restrictions. For many radiation emitting devices, the design, construction and performance standards are insufficient to ensure safety. Proper and careful use of the device also requires adequate instruction for the use of the device to complement the equipment standards.

A significant amendment to the act extends the scope of the act which covers all electro-magnetic and acoustic frequencies. The current act limits the prescribing of standards in the form of regulations to devices that emit electro-magnetic waves having a frequency greater than ten megacycles per second, or ultrasonic waves having frequencies greater than ten kilocycles per second. However, the biological effects of electro-magnetic frequencies and radiation, and of acoustical energy propagation, are governed not only by the frequency but also by the intensity of the propagated radiation and by the absorption properties of the exposed medium.

There is increasing use of a variety of devices which propagate such high levels of power that, despite the low absorption coefficient, sufficient power is absorbed and therefore could be injurious to biological systems. Many devices found in factories, homes and offices, emit radiation below ten megahertz in the radio-frequency range. This would, for example, permit the establishment of a standard for radio-frequency heat sealers. Many of these devices have been found to emit radiation at levels well in excess of currently accepted international standards. Extending the scope of the bill to include all acoustic frequencies would permit an assessment of the health effects of high levels of infrasound which come from air conditioning, heating and ventilation systems, compressors and even large diesel engines.

The biological effects which have been attributed to infrasound include hearing loss, involuntary eye movements, nausea and such symptoms and signs as slowed reactions and fatigue.

Bill C-5 also contains new provisions which will require a manufacturer or importer to notify the minister of any device which, after sale or lease, the manufacturer or importer finds to be injurious to health or fails to perform according to the indicated performance characteristics. In respect of the areas of jurisdiction, the federal government is responsible for the regulatory control of the design, construction and functioning of radiation emitting devices at the point of importation and sale. The provincial governments are responsible for the control of the installation and the use of such devices after sale has taken place.

We know that the United States is a major exporter of radiation emitting devices to this country. Every effort has been made to ensure compatible regulations with only minor variations such as the wording and language of warning signs. The same applies to international standards where they are promulgated. Some countries, however, have minimal or no standards which, if it were Canadian policy to accept the regulations of the producing country, could result in the dumping in Canada of potentially hazardous devices.

Honourable senators can readily see that the amendments to this act are essential for the regulatory control of radiation emitting devices that are potentially hazardous to the Canadian user and which are not subject to the provisions of the present legislation.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Haidasz for introducing the bill. I believe it was originally introduced at the beginning of this Parliament, put on the Order Paper and then reintroduced at the beginning of this session. I am intrigued by the fact that the bill was explained in the House of Commons by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I thought that was stretching the point a bit to have that minister explain the bill on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The sponsor has explained the regulations and the fact that the bill has been extended to cover other devices. I am particularly interested in the reference to acoustic devices, not that I personally feel that my hearing has been impaired by them, but I am thoroughly fed up with these loudspeakers that continually blast rock music wherever one goes. One example of that which comes to mind is every year Ottawa has a Festival of Spring in Major's Hill Park and we are practically blasted out of this building. I hope that the passage of this bill will result in those loudspeakers being subdued somewhat in volume.

I agree with Senator Haidasz that another important extension covered by this bill comprises air conditioners, ventilators and so on.

I have no objection in principle to the bill, but I have a number of questions to raise concerning the definitions within the bill. My first point deals with clause 4 under the heading "Prohibitions" on page 3. It refers to a device creating "a risk to any person of genetic or personal injury, impairment of health or death from radiation..." What are the criteria for establishing a genetic injury and how long a period does this clause cover? Today many young people frequent amusement centres and play video machines for hours. My understanding of a genetic injury is that such injury would not appear until those exposed to radiation produced children. I think there should be some understanding of what the limitation in years is on genetic injuries. I am sure this clause was inserted to cover complaints of pregnant women who are working on video display terminals, word processors and so on. We have heard a number of well-publicized complaints by public servants who complain that these machines are injurious to their health. I should like to know who will establish the level of danger to these people, because unions have one view and the department has another. The bill provides for regulations to be made, but what are the criteria to be used in establishing these regulations?

Clause 6(2) states that the minister may order notification by the manufacturer or importer when a radiation device is defective. What happens in the case of an importer or manufacturer who goes out of business? Honourable senators are familiar with the change in technology. Many products are popular and in demand today, but this time next year there may be no demand for that particular device and the manufacturer is out of business. I believe that this is one weakness in the bill. If the manufacturer goes out of business, who notifies the consumer who has bought this particular item, whether it be a display terminal, a piece of ultrasound equipment or a piece of ventilating equipment? I think the department should compile a list of manufacturers and their customers, and if someone goes out of business, particularly if it is due to defective equipment, the department should be responsible for notifying those customers.

Clause 3 deals with the powers of an inspector. Here I am particularly disturbed with the powers that have been given to an inspector. He can enter any establishment, whether it be a restaurant or a radiologist's office and seize a piece of equipment that, in his opinion, is a radiation device. He can remove it for inspection.

Honourable senators, this raises a number of questions. Where will the device be taken for inspection? Will it be taken to the National Research Council, the Department of National Health and Welfare at Tunney's Pasture, or will it go to the Department of Oceans and Fisheries because that minister introduced the bill? How many places in Canada are equipped to carry out the inspection and testing of a radiation device? Perhaps the sponsor could get that information for us in committee.

Honourable senators, it also concerns me that a device can be kept for 90 days for testing. Let us assume that a piece of X-ray equipment were seized from a radiologist's office. What is the radiologist to do for those 90 days? Does he have to buy new equipment only to be informed 90 days later that the original piece of equipment seized is not defective and is perfectly safe? I think that 90 days is an unnecessarily long period of time to carry out that testing.

After the machine has been seized and held for some time, the minister may notify the owner that he or she may come and repossess the machine. This makes it important to know where the testing is to be done. If a microwave oven were seized from a restaurant in Vancouver or Halifax and kept in Ottawa, the minister would write to the owner a registered letter telling him that the machine is in satisfactory working condition and that he can repossess it. Honourable senators, this would involve an additional expense that would aggravate the loss of revenue incurred during the 90 days.

Since the inspector seizes the equipment in the first place, why does he not return it? Why does the minister have the authority to tell the owner of the equipment that if he does not retrieve his equipment within a specified time, that is, 30 days, then he, the minister, has the authority to dispose of that equipment? That is one aspect of the bill that should be studied in committee.

I have one further question concerning clause 5, which gives the authority to make regulations for devices. Here again we find reference to genetic injury. Honourable senators, what would happen if all video display terminals were declared unsafe because of the threat of genetic injury? Someone may have just purchased a very expensive terminal only to be told that it is unsafe from a genetic point of view. Will he be allowed to continue using that device? Will the individual lose several thousand dollars with no compensation, or will the federal government assume the responsibility for taking that device?

Let us not forget, honourable senators, that the biggest user of these video display terminals is the public service and that the federal government has a particular interest in assuring that their equipment is protected. Perhaps in making these regulations they may be just a bit biased towards their own viewpoint.

Honourable senators, I hope that when this bill is referred to committee there will be witnesses who will answer these questions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Haidasz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips raised many interesting and valid points, some of which were studied by the committee of the other place and others which did not arise there. Therefore, the proposal of Senator Phillips to refer this bill to committee for answers to his questions is very acceptable.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the committee to which Bill C-5 has just been referred has arranged a meeting for this afternoon with the necessary officials in attendance.

It is my understanding that the sponsor of Bill C-49, Senator Steuart, will move that that bill also be referred, after second reading, to the same committee. It is also my understanding that Senator Yuzyk proposes to speak to this bill. Therefore, I propose that we proceed with second reading of Bill C-49 ahead of Bills C-7 and C-8.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit today while the Senate is sitting and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: If the motion is agreed to, the meeting will commence almost immediately in room 256-S in order to study Bill C-5.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. D. G. Steuart moved the second reading of Bill C-49, to approve, give effect to and declare valid the Agreement between the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement, representing the Inuvialuit of the Inuvialuit Settlement Region, and the Government of Canada and to amend the National Parks Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-49 proposes to enshrine in law the final agreement between the Government of Canada and the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement, which represents the Inuvialuit who are the native people living in the western Arctic. It is, therefore, an important bill, important to the political and economic development of the north and, because it represents a major step forward in Canada's relationship with her native people, it is important to all Canadians. The agreement reached with the Inuvialuit is a comprehensive settlement—one that covers a wide range of considerations and that is designed to compensate these people for the historic claims that they have to the lands they have traditionally used and occupied.

Honourable senators, the concept of comprehensive claims originated in 1973. At that time, in a major policy statement, the government acknowledged the traditional rights of native groups who lived in remote areas of Canada that had never previously been covered by treaty. The government expressed its willingness to negotiate comprehensive settlements with these groups in respect of these rights. The government established the office of native claims to administer the process, and over the last decade a substantial number of comprehensive claims has been accepted for negotiation.

As honourable senators may recall, the first comprehensive settlements to be reached and legislated were with the Cree and Inuit of northern Quebec in the James Bay region and with the Naskapi in northeastern Quebec. These settlements were given high priority, since the governments of Canada and Quebec were anxious to reach a fair and satisfactory agreement to enable the major James Bay hydro-electric project to proceed in harmony. The James Bay Agreement, like many first efforts, was not without its problems. In response to complaints from the Cree and Inuit, the government undertook a thorough review of the agreement in 1981. As a consequence of this review, the government has provided additional funding to help defray the costs of administering and monitoring the terms of the agreement. In spite of these problems and some that still exist, the Cree, the Inuit and the federal government remain convinced that the James Bay Agreement is basically fair and that it is workable. The COPE Agreement is the first comprehensive settlement to be achieved in Canada's northern territories.

Honourable senators, I will outline briefly a history of the development of the COPE final agreement and my involvement in it. Following the 1973 statement by the government, recognizing aboriginal rights in the north, preliminary negotiations were commenced with the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, representing all the Inuit of the Arctic region. In 1976, the Inuvialuit, the original people of the western Arctic, set up an organization called the "Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement," referred to as COPE, to negotiate their own comprehensive claim separate from that of the ITC. Both COPE and the government felt there was some urgency to get this claim settled in view of the pending development in the Beaufort Sea. As it turned out, neither the Beaufort development nor the COPE claim were to proceed very rapidly. In October 1978 an agreement in principle was reached between COPE and the Government of Canada. The Government of the Yukon Territory was strongly opposed to the proposed wilderness park and had withdrawn from any participation in the negotiations. In 1979 negotiations towards a final agreement were stopped because the new government wanted time to review the whole agreement in principle. In 1980 I was appointed chief negotiator, and negotiations resumed.

During the next few months, most of our time was spent reviewing the negotiations to that time and examining the agreement in principle. By December 1980 we had isolated five issues that the government felt needed adjusting before a final agreement could be signed. These concerned, first, the proposed wilderness park; second, public and government access on and across Inuvialuit lands; third, that practical participation agreements, arbitration processes and expropriation procedures be developed; fourth, that a regime be agreed upon by which the Crown could gain access to its own subsurface resources without having to compensate the Inuvialuit for subsurface disturbance; and fifth, that any loss of wildlife productivity should be assumed by developers through the existing legal framework.

My repeated attempts to negotiate any concessions in these areas failed, so in 1982 I proposed to the Honourable John Munro that I be replaced as chief negotiator. A conflict of personalities between some of the COPE negotiators and myself had developed and I was convinced a new negotiator was necessary to get the talks back on track.

Mr. Simon Reisman was appointed to act in 1982, and on June 5, 1984, the final agreement was signed. I would point out that all five of the issues upon which negotiations had broken down were settled along the lines proposed by me on behalf of the government. Honourable senators, this proves two things, one, Simon Reisman is a better negotiator than I am, and two, the pending election and the possibility of a new and tougher government had a salutary effect on the COPE negotiators. For example, the proposed park was changed drastically and the other four issues were amended so that they are now more practical and workable than they were in their original form. The proof of this is that the Yukon government came back to the negotiating table and signed the final agreement.

I am told that while not everyone in the north supports the final agreement, it has been accepted by far more people than was the case with the agreement in principle. The vast majority of the Inuvialuit people voted in favour of it. It is not a perfect agreement, but I am convinced that, taking into consideration the length of time involved, the complexity of the issues dealt with and all the competing interests in the north, it is the best that could have been done. Most important, it is a fair settlement for the Inuvialuit and it will not hinder sound economic development in the western Arctic.

As well, honourable senators, the COPE settlement represents an important landmark. It provides assurance and encouragement for those currently negotiating claims in the north and for those with claims yet to be considered—assurance that, with patience and perseverance, a just and workable final settlement is possible. Through this agreement, the Inuvialuit agree to surrender their interest in and claims to certain lands they have traditionally used and occupied. In return, the government has offered a number of measures designed to help them preserve their historic culture and values, to provide opportunities for equal participation in the northern economy and to protect and preserve the Arctic wildlife and environment.

The agreement deals with three main elements: land and its use; economic and social development measures; and wildlife and environmental management. Under the agreement, the Inuvialuit will receive title to some 91,000 square kilometers of land, only about one-fifth of the area they have traditionally used and occupied. Of this total land mass, they will own surface and subsurface rights to some 11,000 square kilometers immediately adjacent to their six main communities. In addition, they will receive surface rights, with subsurface rights to sand and gravel but not oil, gas and minerals, to an additional 78,000 square kilometers.

The economic and social benefits package will feature financial compensation of $45 million in 1977 dollars, payable in annual instalments until 1997. This will equal $152 million, spread over that 20- or 30-year period. The Government will also provide a $10 million economic enhancement fund and a $7.5 million social development fund, both of which are in 1984 dollars. I hope that most or all of this $7.5 million social development fund will be used to give the older Inuvialuit people some immediate help, because they have been waiting a long time.

Honourable senators, the bill itself points out that in exchange for the specific rights, lands and compensation granted through the agreement to the Inuvialuit, they in turn agree to surrender all of their native claims, rights, title and interests, whatever they may be, in and to the territory, meaning both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and adjacent offshore areas. Of course, they do not lose any rights they hold now or will hold in future as Canadian citizens. The National Parks Act is amended to accommodate the new national park in the Yukon Territory.

In effect, honourable senators, Bill C-49 gives legal validity to the agreement in principle. I believe that all those people from the government and from COPE, who worked so long and hard to reach this very important milestone in our relationship with Canada's first people, are to be congratulated. They took on a difficult job and they did it well in the face of great odds. Honourable senators, I believe this measure was supported unanimously in the other place, and I urge all honourable senators to give this bill their support.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate Senator Steuart for his lucid explanation of this bill. Since he was involved in the negotiations which dragged on for many years, he knows much more than he has presented to the chamber today. We on this side of the house agree with the principle of the bill, which in effect approves and declares valid the agreement known also as the Western Arctic Claim.

I received this document of 114 pages just a short while ago and have had no time to study it. It is true that the Inuvialuit voted to ratify the agreement with a majority of 81 per cent, which would justify our support. But one-fifth of the people disapproved, and they must have had good reason to oppose some of the clauses. Furthermore, the government carried on the negotiations with selected representatives of the Inuvialuit in secrecy. I understand that the opponents of this agreement argued in favour of a cash settlement and had other demands and reservations.

I believe that this bill should not be passed by the Senate until we have received a more detailed explanation regarding the agreement, which will seriously affect the lives of the aboriginal people for many years into the future and, as a matter of fact, forever. I am therefore requesting that the bill be sent to committee for more thorough examination. Our sober second thought will give the bill better credibility. We want the Inuvialuit to get the best possible deal, as it will set a precedent for the settlement of claims of other native peoples. I may also wish to comment on third reading.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I realize that if I speak now, it will have the effect of closing debate on second reading of this bill!

Hon. David Walker: Good.

Senator Steuart: I appreciate Senator Yuzyk's suggestion that this bill be referred to committee. We have made arrangements for that, and I am sure that officials will be present to answer any questions that honourable senators may have. This is a complicated bill and it is to be regretted that we have received it in the dying days of this session, and possibly of this Parliament. I would normally be quite angry about this, but in this case the situation was such that negotiations were concluded not very long ago, and by the time the government was able to prepare the legislation I believe it could not have gone through the Commons and the Senate much earlier.

The honourable senator mentioned one or two points on which I should like to comment. He said that one-fifth of the people voted against it. It is my experience with the Inuvialuit people, and with the Inuit people generally, that they are very democratic, and the people who were opposed to the legislation felt that there should be more money coming to the people immediately. That is why I believe that the $7.5 million fund—which I understand will be used to provide some help, particularly to older people in the area—is a good thing.

On the question of holding meetings in secrecy, I have heard that charge raised before, and I do not believe it is fair. Negotiations were held by the people representing the Committee of the Original Peoples' Entitlement, which represented all of the Inuvialuit people. COPE people were elected quite regularly. When I was negotiator I held meetings in the north and invited the public to come and discuss freely the whole agreement in principle; which was signed before I became the negotiator. That document was circulated all over the north to all of the people concerned. Some of those who attended the meetings were quite angry about what they claimed to be the lack of democracy. I challenged them that elections were forthcoming and that if they did not like it they could run in the elections. I said it was not our job, coming from the south, or representing the government, or as negotiators, to tell them how to run their own affairs; that they should get out and run for election. Some of them did, and some who were opposed to the committee's negotiators were elected. However, there was no particular change.

Meetings were held by the negotiators, and the results of those meetings were quite widely circulated, so that all of the people had an opportunity to know what was going on, whether or not they agreed with it.

I consider Senator Yuzyk's remarks to be fair, and I know that he will probably have something to say in committee and on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Steuart moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill C-7, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased with this opportunity to present Bill C-7, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff.

This bill would enact the amendments to the Customs Tariff announced in the Notice of Ways and Means tabled by the Minister of Finance on April 19, 1983 with the budget brought down on that date.

The changes have been in effect on a temporary basis, since the day after the budget.

I do not intend to repeat the comments of the Minister of Finance.

First of all, the bill provides for improvements in the general preferential tariff (GPT) for developing countries. It proposes new or lower GPT rates, and especially a "free" rate for a broad range of products, in accordance with the recommendation made in Part II of the Tariff Board's report. The SPT has been extended for an additional period of ten years, until June 30, 1994. The rules of origin are being amended so that value added in any GPT country will count towards the national content that products must have to be allowed entry at GPT rates.

Second, the bill raises the value limitations on goods that Canadians returning from abroad may bring back duty- and tax-free. The main increases in tourist exemptions will raise the quarterly exemption after an absence of not less than 48 hours from $50 to $100; the annual exemption, available once a year after an absence of not less than seven days, is being increased from $150 to $300. I think there may be a conflict of interest here, because I occasionally take advantage of this exemption, like many other senators, I suppose.

Third, the bill provides for higher rates for feed pellet mill dies and rolls and a number of bulldozer parts. These are rather technical terms and their translation may be difficult. In any case, if there are any questions, we can answer them.

The duties on these items will re-instate the protective tariff that was lost as a result of concessions made during the Tokyo round. Canada is negotiating these increases with the United States, under GATT, and they are to come into effect on a date to be proclaimed once negotiations have been finalized.

Fourth, the bill provides a certain number of miscellaneous tariff changes, including new tariff items and amendments to existing ones, in order to implement the Tariff Board's recommendations covering firebrick and other refractory products; a new item that will allow duty-free entry for electronic church carillons; reduced rates on crawler loaders and bulldozers and diesel engines for crawler machines; a new tariff item allowing recording studios to import mixing consoles and tape recorders duty free.

There are new tariff items providing for free entry of banana chips from developing countries; prayer shawls, prayer shawl fringes and prayer shawl bags; motion picture films and videotapes for commercials intended for television; seed oyster collectors and collector stands.

While these tariff changes probably do not have any great significance or impact, they still represent a major contribution to the evolution of the tariff policy in Canada. They certainly deserve to be supported by the Senate.

I shall restrict my comments to a few general remarks concerning the policy principles upon which the tariff changes proposed in this bill are based.

First, let us look at the amendments to the general preferential tariff mentioned in clauses 1, 2 and 4 and Schedule I of Bill C-7.

Honourable senators, you are probably aware that the GPT was established in July 1974 as Canada's contribution to the international efforts made under the aegis of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development or UNCTAD. The purpose was to help developing countries diversify and increase their exports of finished and semi-finished products, thus improving their balance of payments position.

Most other developed countries have adopted similar preferential tariff measures. When the GPT was implemented, the government developed protective procedures so that it would be in a position to amend or withdraw the GPT benefits whenever imports from the developing countries were harming Canadian producers.

In 1980, the Minister of Finance announced that these means of protection would be strengthened by allowing Canadian producers to ask the Tariff Board to withdraw the benefits of the GPT in cases of presumed harmful competition on the part of developing countries.

The GPT has provided major benefits to developing countries which export to Canada, without causing serious upheavals in Canadian production. This preferential tariff, including the changes contained in this bill, reflects Canada's desire to improve the economic situation of the Third World countries.

In addition, the bill now under consideration contains a number of tariff amendments designed to raise the ceiling of exemptions allowed to tourists.

The government, and especially the Minister of Finance, are under constant pressure from the travelling public requesting more generous exemptions.

While it is quite understandable for Canadians on their return from the United States or other countries to want to bring in goods they have purchased without paying any duties or taxes, it must be noted that the exemptions allowed to tourists were never meant to ease shopping trips abroad or to encourage people to make major purchases while travelling.

The purpose of these exemptions is to free Canadian residents from the inconvenience of having to declare souvenirs or small items they purchase occasionally while travelling, and of having to pay duty or taxes.

They also aim at reducing the cost, both in time and money, of having customs officers collect duty and taxes on these items. We have to make sure that the exemptions granted to tourists are not so generous as to have harmful effects on Canadian businesses and on our balance of payments situation as compared with other countries, especially the United States.

Honourable senators know that we are traditionally in a travel deficit position with that country. It is important not to take measures likely to worsen the situation to the extent that severe countermeasures would be needed.

The higher exemptions granted to tourists under the bill are reasonable and have been welcomed by Canadians who travel in the United States or overseas. Those higher exemptions will not have any noticeable impact in Canadian business circles or on the situation of our travel account.

I have a few brief comments on the tariff increases contained in the bill. Those increases apply only to the odd piece of equipment and, therefore, do not represent a change in the Canadian government's trade or tariff policy.

Successive Canadian governments did not adopt a policy of higher tariffs because such measures are generally very expensive at the national and international levels. Canada has always maintained that, if the international trade community wants to derive maximum benefits from free trade, we must be strongly opposed to protectionist, tariff and non-tariff measures. This fact is particularly significant now that we are trying to fight our way out of the worst and longest recession since the thirties.

It has been shown time and again that restrictive trade practices can only give rise to and worsen economic problems. Freer trade has the opposite effect since it promotes economic development, new investments and job creation.

Experts keep repeating that between one quarter and one third of Canada's GNP is generated by exports. Since we in Canada are so dependent on exports, we must be among the first to speak out against protectionist measures.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, Bill C-7, as our colleague Senator Leblanc has pointed out, is a bill to outline various changes in the tariff system in Canada. It was introduced in the other place as part of the ways and means motion attached to the April budget. In early May it was introduced as a bill in the other place and now it is coming to us two days or so before we adjourn for the summer recess. But we are becoming quite used to that sort of thing, because that is not at all unusual. Perhaps what is a little unusual about the bill is that it has a schedule attached to it which lists the changes in the tariff which will take place. I do not know if that means we are going to have a different system of legislation in Canada in the future. Perhaps instead of having an Order in Council incorporating all the changes that are listed here we will have them in the legislation itself which, I think, is a worthwhile change.

The tariff reductions that are listed are retroactive to April 20, 1983. The increases do not take place until the proclamation of the act which will not be until some time in the future.

My honourable friend, in introducing the bill, listed many of the items that will be affected. I thought he was going to list all of them but he spared us a few. One notable change which I think should have been brought to the attention of our colleagues is that some mynah birds which have traditionally been allowed into the country are not allowed in any more, with two very important exceptions, the Chinese talking mynah and the Hill mynah, and I am sure that the population of Canada will take heart from this very thoughtful exception by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Bravo!

Senator Doody: I should have pointed out when I mentioned the relief from Order-in-Council authority, that there is an Order-in-Council authority to exempt goods if they need to be shipped directly from the country of origin to qualify for this general preferential tariff. By and large, the thrust of the bill is a good one. It allows the developing countries to export some of their products to Canada with preferential treatment, and I think that is a very welcome change.

On a more personal note, as Senator Leblanc pointed out, we all welcome the doubling of the exemption from duty for people travelling. Those of us who might get an opportunity to travel from time to time will be able to bring in a few duty-free goods.

Most of the other items are housekeeping ones and I see no reason to object to the passage of this bill. I am sure that my colleagues on this side of the house endorse its passage as well.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Leblanc speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Senator Leblanc.]

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: If no other senator wishes to speak, it seems that we all agree to move the adoption of this bill. I want to thank Senator Doody for his kind remarks. I will say no more so that this bill can be read for the second time right now.

[English]

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I should like to pose one question to the mover of this bill. Clause 9(2) refers to the Latin words Sturnus vulgaris. Could Senator Leblanc give me a literal translation of those words because I am not very good in Latin?

Senator Leblanc: Unfortunately, I do not have the translation with me.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SPECIAL IMPORT MEASURES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-8, respecting the imposition of anti-dumping and countervailing duties, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, the Customs Tariff and the Export and Import Permits Act and to repeal the Anti-dumping Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is not a simple one, but its principles and background, I hope, will have a bearing on encouraging you to support it. The bill is a result of quite a lengthy consultative process which began with the publication of a discussion paper put forward in July 1980 by the Minister of Finance entitled "Proposals on Import Policy."

The next step was that that discussion paper was referred to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which established a subcommittee on import policy to examine the proposals that were in that discussion paper. I believe that subcommittee spent two years examining it, and its report was presented in June 1982. The bill is a combination of three things: the import policy proposals—the discussion paper, the subcommittee report and the comments received from all sources during the hearings and representations made by the public.

The purpose of the legislative changes in the bill resulted from the Tokyo Round of the multilateral trade negotiations—MTN—and the objective is a substantial reduction in the level of tariff protection afforded industry in Canada, most to be fully implemented, as we heard through Senator van Roggen's report, by January 1987. Canada agreed to measures such as implementing the GATT code on customs valuations by 1985, and that would make Canada's import regime more open and transparent.

The objective is for Canadian industry to be operating in a much more competitive trade environment in the future, which will in many cases provide benefits and opportunities that did not exist before. However, there may be some dangers, and one of the main objectives of the bill is to deal with those possible dangers.

The changes are aimed at ensuring that Canada is well equipped to deal effectively with injurious import competition and other trade problems arising from the consequences, as I have described them, of the Tokyo round. The changes are also aimed at ensuring that Canada's procedures and policy instruments in this area are as efficient and effective as those of our main trading partners who have already passed legislation to take advantage of those arrangements. The essential elements of the bill are certain parallel procedures in anti-dumping and countervailing duty cases; some specific time limits on the various stages of the proceedings; some provisions for the acceptance of undertakings; some provisions in the capital goods sector; the principle of equity and fairness—the famous expression of “fair trade”; and some provisions for public disclosure.

Honourable senators, because we are dealing with the principle of the bill at this stage—although I have some speech notes which add to the notes to which I have just referred—I have asked for a summary of the bill and, on second reading, it is my intention simply to use that summary which is only a page and a half long. I apologize to honourable senators for reading it, but, having compared it to this rather stout book I have containing a good deal of information, I think it is a good summary of the bill. Therefore, I mean to refer to those notes in order to explain the principle of the bill in summary form.

This measure entitled “Special Import Measures Act” replaces the Anti-dumping Act and amends provisions of the Currency and Exchange Act, the Customs Tariff and the Export and Import Permits Act. As I mentioned, it is the product of the lengthy three-stage consultative process—the policy paper, the establishment of the subcommittee, and the hearings of the committee and its consultation with those interested.

The main purpose of the bill is to make Canada's anti-dumping and countervail legislation more effective in preventing injury to Canadian producers from dumped or subsidized imports. It will allow Canada to take full advantage of its GATT rights in respect of such practices. At the same time, it provides for more transparent and equitable procedures in response to complaints from Canadian producers regarding the current anti-dumping and countervail systems.

Honourable senators are aware of the steps that must now be taken if an importer seems to be dumping goods in Canada, that is, if goods are being sold in Canada at prices cheaper than those at which they are sold in the place of manufacture offshore. The steps are that the department makes what is called a preliminary finding of dump, that is, that there is a margin of dump. They stipulate what the margin of dump is, which is the difference between those two prices. Perhaps Senator Phillips will find this an oversimplification, but I am trying to simplify rather than complicate the matter. When that preliminary finding of dump is made, there is, of course, a levy of a tax. The next stage is to go to the Anti-dumping Tribunal to find the second element, and that is, injurious effect on the domestic industry.

Some streamlining is proposed by this bill. Essentially, it provides for the imposition of anti-dumping and countervailing duties; parallel procedures in anti-dumping and countervail cases, replacing the current countervail provisions of the customs tariff, legislated time limits on the various stages of anti-dumping and countervail proceedings; and the authority to accept undertakings from exporters or their governments in countervail cases instead of imposing the duties I referred to, which are imposed at the present time under the present system.

Such undertakings will be aimed at eliminating dumping margins or subsidies or the injury they cause without going through the full procedure of a formal inquiry by the Canadian Import Tribunal, formerly the Anti-dumping Tribunal.

The last case I had before the Anti-dumping Tribunal took, in terms of preparation, some several months and about a month and a half in terms of hearings. That, incidentally, honourable senators, was before I was appointed to the Senate.

The bill will permit the Canadian Import Tribunal to consider the consumer interest and make recommendations to the Minister of Finance regarding the level of the countervail or anti-dumping duty in cases where it considers that imposition of duties equal to the full amount of the subsidy or margin of dumping would not be in the public interest.

Persons in Canada having information relevant to an investigation will be required to furnish this information to Revenue Canada on request. There are provisions dealing with the treatment of confidential information.

Honourable senators, I now turn to the Currency and Exchange Act which is being amended to provide a more firm basis for the regulation-making authority regarding the conversion of foreign currencies to equivalent values in Canadian dollars.

The Customs Tariff is being amended to permit more flexibility in the application of emergency safeguard measures. It will be possible for the government to apply surtaxes for more than six months without parliamentary review, where this has been recommended by an administrative tribunal. Provision is made to apply surtaxes after specified volumes of imports are reached—that is the tariff rate quotas—and the Customs Tariff is also being amended to broaden the range of measures that can be taken against other countries to enforce Canada's rights under a trade agreement or to respond to actions of another country that adversely affect trade in Canadian goods and services. Provision is also made to apply surcharges on imports in cases where Canada's balance-of-payments position requires such action.

Finally, the last area of amendment is to the Export and Import Permits Act. It provides authority for the government to place goods on the import control list to gather information. Permits must be issued freely for goods subject to such monitoring.

The bill contains sunset provisions limiting the duration of undertakings and safeguard measures to three years and tribunal findings to five years. Without explicit review and renewal, the measures or findings will lapse.

Honourable senators, let me state again the basic principle of the bill and the setting: Because of the Tokyo round, because of the fact that by 1987 many of our import restrictions will have disappeared and with other nations knowing that is going to happen, we have come up with a plan to deal with, in effect, this new atmosphere in terms of international trade, international customs and countervail duties.

Honourable senators, I have described the background and history of the main provisions of the bill. I would ask for support on second reading.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sufficient of an optimist to believe that this bill will make some improvement in Canada's commercial and industrial policies and, perhaps, even in our relations with those foreign countries where we do business. But I have to say that I think this bill has a greater significance from the commercial point of view, the industrial point of view, the economic point of view and the international point of view than perhaps one would suspect by looking at it. Mind you, there is a lot of looking to do because the bill is 90 pages in length and is a densely worded document.

I admit that I am a little uncomfortable about trying to deal with a measure of this sort which reached my desk this afternoon. What little I know of it I have gained by a cursory study in the last little while. I speak now, however, because I want to provide the maximum opportunity to have this bill considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce because there are parts of it which really do require further examination and explanation before we give our final approval to such a measure.

The bill appears to me to be a bureaucrat's delight, because there are more provisions in it for bureaucratic regulation, bureaucratic administration and bureaucratic decision-making than one usually finds in legislation these days, even though it has become quite customary to concede enormous powers to our masters in the governmental bureaucracy. That part of it alone makes me think that it requires some careful consideration by us. We should examine exactly what those powers are, how they are to be exercised, and, what is more important, what can be done about it by someone who feels aggrieved. That is the danger in passing legislation which provides enormous bureaucratic powers: if a person feels it is not fair, what can he do about it?

● (1720)

While I think there is a great improvement in this bill with respect to the concept of judicial process and with respect to certain appeal procedures, personally speaking I do not think that it really goes as far as it should in dealing with the problem that we have.

Senator Frith: That is in Part VII.

Senator Roblin: Whatever Part it is in—and perhaps I have overlooked it and I am willing to be corrected—my initial examination of this bill leads me to feel that it is somewhat lacking in that respect.

Senator Frith: I did not mean to correct you. I meant that the provisions to which you refer are contained in Part VII.

Senator Roblin: Very good. When the deputy minister approves of the findings of the Dominion Customs Appraiser and somebody does not like it, he can appeal to the Federal Court. On the first round, it would go to the Tariff Board. If that still gives no satisfaction to the appellant, he can take it to the Federal Court on matters of law but not on matters of fact. My experience has been that it is on matters of fact that the problems arise. That is where disputes occur. When appeal on matters of fact are excluded from the appeal procedure, I think we ought to examine it very carefully. If we choose to exercise our power, which I doubt we will do, we should ensure that such provisions are incorporated into the bill.

Dealing with anti-dumping and countervailing measures, we now have a renamed board. I think it has a better name now, in terms of public relations. It is now called the Canadian Import Tribunal, which sounds much better than the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. The name change cannot help but do good.

Consider, however, what that board has the power to deal with. It has the power to deal with a finding as to whether or not dumping exists. The minister has the power to define dumping. He has the power to define subsidies. This body, the Canadian Import Tribunal, has the power to determine whether the case in question is encompassed within the ministerial or bureaucratic definition. Measured against those definitions, it can rule on the question of dumping and on the question of subsidy. Honourable senators, I suggest that those are necessary functions, but this goes much beyond that.

The Canadian Import Tribunal is also entrusted with dealing with the matter of material injury. It is not only necessary to prove dumping or to have a subsidy, but material injury must also be proven. That is a good thing, because if there is to be any consumer protection at all, then of course this question of material injury to some Canadian manufacturer is important in order that our consumers receive some consideration. There is, however, another concept that this board will handle, and that is called retardation. Retardation seems to mean that if, by importing X from another country, we hinder or retard or hold back production of X by a Canadian company, then that provides grounds for doing something against this importing of X from another country.

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, consider how far that concept could be carried if someone wanted to do so. Perhaps it is essential that it should be dealt with, but what bothers me is that, as far as I can see from reading the bill, there is no appeal procedure. If the Canadian Import Tribunal decides that a product is being imported, which process retards the manufacture of that product by somebody in Winnipeg—and that certainly must be a highly subjective judgment—there is no appeal from that decision.

Senator Frith: On matters of law.

Senator Roblin: There is no appeal on matters of law either. If there is provision for an appeal on matters of law, I would be glad to know about it. I did not see such a provision in the bill.

Senator Frith: I believe there could be a review. I think you are technically correct on the question of an appeal. Perhaps we will have something more to say about it in committee.

Senator Roblin: When this bill is studied in committee we could discuss these matters in more detail.

Honourable senators, if there is no appeal from this board on questions of fact, then indeed it has been clothed with very extensive bureaucratic powers. Whatever the case may be, I think it is essential that the procedure be considered, because process in this area is vital. It is necessary that the concept of judicial process be clearly established by means of this legislation. It is necessary that we make sure that the concept of due process is obvious in the procedures that will be followed when dealing with imports from other countries. It is necessary that there be a transparency of process so that people who feel adversely affected by what is done under this act can have some satisfaction in thinking they have a square deal before the law, a square deal before the board or a square deal before the tribunal.

Speaking from some interesting experience in dealing with the Congress of the United States, honourable senators, I have found that one of the main complaints that congressmen have in dealing with Canada on matters of trade is that, so far, Canada has shrouded her decision-making process within what I will call the closed circle of the bureaucracy, and that in the Canadian system the concept of due process is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. I think that this bill improves that situation and I am certainly glad that it does so, because we are going to have enough occasions for differences of opinion between Canadian and American economic interests in the future without adding any new ones. If we can, by means of improving the process under this method, open up the procedure so that it appeals to fair-minded people as being fair, that will be well worth doing. I am encouraged to believe that some progress has been made in that regard by means of this bill.

Honourable senators, now that we have abolished most of our tariffs or have put them on the endangered species list—I believe that by 1987, 90 per cent of our exports to the United States will be tariff-free and about 70 per cent of American exports to Canada will be tariff-free—let us be careful that we do not indulge in the new and fashionable concept of non-tariff barriers. This is a non-tariff barrier bill par excellence, and it has to be used judiciously. In respect of our own people we have a duty to them to see that they are not prejudiced because of “unfair tactics” on the part of other people. But we have to be careful that we do not indulge in “unfair tactics” ourselves. This question is exceedingly important because we are living in a world that is more international in terms of trade than most of us are inclined to think.

I would say, honourable senators, that there are some powers in this bill which seem to me to be curious. I see that very substantial powers are handed to the executive under the Customs Tariff Act. If, in the sole judgment of the executive, some other government has done us dirt or has been unfair to us, that executive can suspend or withdraw the rights granted to that other country to trade in Canada, even if those rights are given by an act of Parliament. Therefore, in this bill we are conveying to the executive the right to abrogate an act of Parliament. While there may be good and substantial reasons for this, they are not obvious. It seems to me that in committee we should ask for an explanation as to why such a drastic power is necessary. Furthermore, the bill provides that in conjunction with that provision we can subject any class of goods, which we think some foreigner is cheating on, to a surtax of a very substantial amount, or, if we really get tough, we can put him on the import control list and not let him in at all. I should point out that orders made under this section are not subject to the control of Parliament. They do not expire. They are good for as long as the Order in Council covering the matter stipulates. The minister has to lay a statement before Parliament, but that is all.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that if an act of Parliament is abrogated, we should be a little more conscious about the way in which it is done and the powers that are given to Parliament to deal with this matter in the proper way. So that is a power which strikes me as being unusual, or, if it is not unusual, it certainly should be. I believe it requires a good deal of justification.

There is another measure in here that also caught my eye. It reminded me of President Nixon in 1972 and how much we resented what he did to us when he put the 10 per cent surtax on the import of Canadian goods because of balance of trade and balance of payments problems. We also give our government the power to do that. The bill says:

Where—to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council, on a report of the Minister of Finance, that Canada's external financial position and its balance of payments are such as to require special measures respecting Canadian imports, . . .

And so on. If the Governor in Council thinks that happens to be the case, they can then put surcharges on every form of import that this country knows. It is not limited to any particular sort. It is sweeping. It covers it all, and it does not even say "You have to treat them all the same". You can treat them differently, if you like. Honourable senators can see that a measure of that kind, particularly without reference to Parliament in the first instance, is fraught with problems, if it is used in an injudicious manner.

Senator Frith said quite rightly that this is good for half the year only. After that these measures expire unless Parliament reconfirms them. This is a point on which I would like some clarification when the bill is in committee. These are powers of executive initiative of a quite extraordinary character, and when we combine them with all of the other powers in this bill, if we had a government that was inclined to be autarchic, or one that did not like continentalism, or one that went overboard on Canadian nationalism, and things of that sort, we can easily see how effectively they could take control of our international trading situation. From conversations and experience I have found out that these matters cannot be considered solely as matters of domestic interest. I accept that fundamentally they are of domestic interest, and that the government has a fundamental responsibility to the citizens and to the domestic situation; but we cannot deal with these measures without being aware of the fact that other people know what we are doing and that there are consequences.

The kind of thing that obviously comes to mind are the problems we are facing with the United States these days in respect of their own legislation much the same as this; and one need only refer to the situation respecting the exportation of Canadian steel products to the United States to know what I am talking about. So this is a bill that is not of domestic application only, but is one which if used to any considerable degree will impinge on our trade with the United States. While I am all in favour of fair rules for Canadians, of legitimate protection where we are in an unfair situation—make no mistake about that—I am not advocating that there should be no rules or any procedures of this kind. I think there should be. I am simply saying that there are international implications which certainly cannot be lost sight of. I am saying—to myself, at any rate—that if we want the Americans to listen to us on steel, we had better make sure that we listen to them when they have problems to which they want some attention paid.

I conclude my remarks by saying that I will support the bill on second reading and also on having it referred to committee. Despite the long gestation—or birth pains—of this bill, and the serious study that has taken place elsewhere, I hope there can be a meaningful meeting of the committee. I regret that the meeting cannot be held immediately. I am sure the chairman of the committee will agree with me that there is more than an hour's work involved in the study of this bill—but "needs must when the devil drives". Under those circumstances, I am prepared to vote for the bill on second reading.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I have to advise honourable senators that if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have little to quarrel with in what Senator Roblin has said. In fact, I congratulate him on underlining a dimension to all such legislation and schemes, namely, that there is a tendency to say, "Why should we worry about anything that we do to alleged foreign dumpers? All we need to be concerned about is the protection of our own industry."

As the honourable senator has pointed out, there is also the interest of the consumer in being able to take advantage of competitive prices. The honourable senator is also quite right in saying that this legislation is weighted in favour of the domestic industry. He is right also in that there are a number of unusual powers to bring that about.

Because all nations, and our trading partners, will be operating in a different atmosphere, the purpose of the bill is to ensure that we are playing with the same tools or weapons. That is the objective. But it may well be that in some cases we have gone too far. In any event, I believe it is quite reasonable for Senator Roblin to ask that we have an opportunity to discuss some of these provisions in detail, to be sure that they are necessary to support the purpose of the bill, and also to ensure that the provisions have not gone too far. Therefore, if the bill receives second reading, I propose to move that it be referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Barrow is arranging to have the committee meet some time tomorrow morning. Leave will be sought to allow the committee to meet while the Senate is sitting.

NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA MANUFACTURING STANDARDS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John M. Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill C-234, to establish standards for the manufacture of the national flag of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-234 is quite short, and the explanation will be just as short.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: The purpose of the bill is to have the Canadian General Standards Board establish standards for the manufacture of our national flag, corresponding, of course, to its intended use. Obviously different standards will apply to the manufacture of flags to be used outdoors in all kinds of weather, as opposed to those that are to be used indoors for special occasions.

The need for some standards is self-evident, after one sees flags flying that have deteriorated—if that is the proper term to use. Their colour has faded or the edges are worn and torn and they present a shabby appearance. Apparently there are no standards to be followed. Of course, if the flags are new, there is no way of judging the material or the dyes used in their manufacture. If the flag should deteriorate rapidly, the purchaser has no redress.

Honourable senators will notice that the bill does not impose the proposed standards on flag manufacturers. What it does is protect the purchaser by providing that flags manufactured in compliance with the standards established shall bear a mark identifying the flag as meeting those standards. All the purchaser of a flag will have to do if this bill becomes law is to make sure the flag he buys has that mark. If he buys a flag which does not have that mark, then he can blame none but himself if the flag deteriorates in a short time. There is also a provision which would make it compulsory, after the act has been in force for two years, that all government departments and crown corporations purchase only flags bearing that identifying mark. That is very important, for I understand that such departments and corporations use a great many Canadian flags.

Honourable senators, while this bill was introduced in the House of Commons by an opposition member, after only one amendment it was accepted by the government and was supported by all members of that house. I may add that it was passed rapidly in all stages, and I ask for your support in its speedy passage here.

If I may digress for a moment, it is interesting to note that the use of the Canadian flag is becoming more and more general. This has been encouraged by the Department of the Secretary of State, which each year, usually in the month of June, makes available to all members of Parliament a number of pole flags and desk flags. I know that the pole flags in particular are in great demand and I for one can never supply all the requests I receive for them, even though I get the maximum number provided and some extras from other senators. I would also add that I would be quite pleased to receive any additional flags if honourable senators see fit to pass them my way. The Department of the Secretary of State should be commended for providing these flags, and I hope it continues the practice. I believe this is a good bill and I ask that you support my motion for second reading.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we believe it is a good bill and we give it our support.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE EXAMINATION OF ONGOING EFFECTS OF RESTRUCTURING ON FISHING INDUSTRY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the ongoing effects of the restructuring of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, before we stand this order, I would like an explanation as to why nothing has happened with it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like an opportunity to talk to Senator Marshall about this order and we can deal with it tomorrow, if that is satisfactory.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if my honourable friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, has any new information for us about the bills we may expect tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we may receive some bills later in the day tomorrow, but at the moment the bills which the other place is dealing with are the three I mentioned, the bills on the peace institute, the offshore and interest. At the moment, I have no more information than I gave earlier today. I am about to suggest that we revert to motions so that I may move a motion that we sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. We can clean up any business we have by noon and, perhaps, have Royal Assent on the bills that are ready. I see no prospect of receiving any bills between now and noon tomorrow, but there are a couple of orders which Senator Macdonald would like to speak to and we can use the time tomorrow for that purpose.

Senator Roblin: I want to be quite clear that I understand my honourable friend. There is a possibility that we will have no new bills tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock?

Senator Frith: That's correct.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend suggesting that there will be Royal Assent tomorrow?

Senator Frith: If by noon tomorrow there are a number of bills ready for Royal Assent, I shall suggest that we have Royal Assent given to those bills and if nothing else comes over we may not need to have another Royal Assent after that.

Senator Roblin: I do not wish to interfere with the way my honourable friend conducts the business, but why have Royal Assent twice when one Royal Assent on Friday would be adequate?

Senator Frith: It may not be necessary to have two.

Senator Roblin: I hope not.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, June 28, 1984, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz, for Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-49, intituled: "An Act to approve, give effect to and declare valid the Agreement between the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement, representing the Inuvialuit of the Inuvialuit Settlement Region, and the Government of Canada and to amend the National Parks Act in consequence thereof", has in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 27, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45 (1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, there was a very useful exchange of views and critical remarks on Bill C-49 in committee, during the course of which many matters were clarified. The bill was then approved without amendment. The Inuvialuit Agreement between the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement and the Government of Canada, approved by the Governments of Yukon and the Northwest Territories and by 81 per cent of the people of this region, will now become law.

We should like to congratulate our versatile colleague, Senator Steuart, for his contributions in the final negotiations which achieved the significant settlement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Undoubtedly, it will be a model for other aboriginal peoples to follow. The Inuvialuit wanted a collective agreement which has now been approved by Parliament. If they want any subsequent improvements this will have to be done through the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement—COPE—whose chairman appeared before the Senate committee meeting yesterday together with officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Justice.

The Inuvialuit have won a large measure of autonomy. They will be running most of their own affairs within Canada. Having been in their region three times with the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, I feel that I gained a good understanding of their problems and aspirations. I am sure that honourable senators, including Senator Willie Adams, who worked hard on their behalf, will join me in extending to the Inuvialuit our very best wishes for a happy and prosperous life in freedom and security.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Yuzyk for his kind remarks. It is not quite true to say I was the one who accomplished the final act. Many people in the Native Claims Office, including the COPE negotiators, helped to bring it to the ten-yard line, but it was due to the efforts of Simon Reisman and others that it got carried over the five-yard line.

I am very pleased that this very important piece of legislation is going to receive Royal Assent, and I am sure I express the sentiments of all honourable senators when I say that this will be a new step for the Inuvialuit of the Western Arctic, and that it will set a pattern for the other ten comprehensive claims that are now in the process of being negotiated.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Deputy Leader of the Government report to the Senate on what may happen in the other place?

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have now had third reading of all legislation sent to us up to this point.

Last evening, Bill C-34, to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Financial Administration Act, was passed by the House of Commons. There was some amendment of the bill, and I have not yet received a copy as passed by the House of Commons, but I hope to receive it later today.

I also expect that later today we will receive Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

Senator Flynn: Why did we not receive a message from the House of Commons concerning Bill C-34?

Senator Frith: The bill, as passed on third reading, is being reprinted.

Senator Flynn: A message could have been given to the Speaker.

Senator Frith: It could have been, but we requested that reprinted copies of the bill, encompassing the amendments, be sent to us.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Were any amendments made to the bill to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act?

Senator Frith: I am not sure. I have been told that copies of the bills as passed by the House of Commons will be sent to us later today. Today, I understand, Bill C-32, to establish the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, will be passed by agreement in the other place. There is also agreement that Bill C-43, respecting the Canada-Nova Scotia Agreement on Offshore Oil and Gas Resource Management and Revenue Sharing; Bill C-30, to amend the Bank Act; and Bill C-36, to amend the Interest Act, will also be passed. I might add parenthetically that Bill C-36 is a companion piece to Bill C-37, which the Senate has now passed. That will be it, with the exception of Bill C-24, to amend the Financial Administration Act in relation to crown corporations. Honourable senators will remember that there has been a good deal of controversy over its application to cultural institutions. I heard on the news this morning that Mr. Gray, the President of the Treasury Board, agreed that the bill would not apply to those cultural institutions. Therefore, there is a good chance of agreement in the other place to deal with that bill either today or tomorrow. Friday, there will be some non-controversial bills passed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are there any?

Senator Frith: I hope so. I make the distinction because the bills that I referred to earlier are controversial ones upon which agreement has been reached.

As for today, honourable senators, the plan is to dispose of all the legislation that we have passed by having Royal Assent this morning. I will then move that the Senate adjourn until 2, at which time we will deal with the two bills that I mentioned, namely, Bill C-34 and Bill C-33. If we get any more legislation this afternoon—Bills C-32, C-43, C-30 or C-36—we may decide to sit tonight. Tomorrow we will deal with whatever legislation we have before us at that time.

It is planned that the House of Commons, after completing whatever legislation it is able to complete, will adjourn to wait for as long as is necessary for the Senate to deal with that legislation, after which the two houses will join for Royal Assent.

Senator Asselin: We may have to sit next week.

Senator Frith: There is always that possibility.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Has the deputy leader any idea as to when the house will indicate that it will not pass any more bills?

Senator Frith: No, I have not. Incidentally, honourable senators, in considering that program, we could, if necessary, revert to Question Period this afternoon at 2 o'clock when the ministers are here, in case there are questions to put to them. Of course, that would not preclude us from continuing with Question Period now.

Senator Flynn: We could do that, but I doubt that it would be useful to put any questions to the outgoing ministers.

Senator Frith: I had a feeling that I should not have mentioned that.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-37, to amend the National Housing Act.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is carried, perhaps I might offer a comment or two based on the proceedings in committee, which I think were enlightening.

When this bill was first proposed by the minister in the other place, he was quoted as saying, and I use his words:

Since the program was announced on budget night we have conducted intense consultations with the lending institutions and others who will be involved in delivering mortgage rate protection and we believe we now have a program which will suit the needs of all homeowners.

I must say that I took that statement at its face value when I first heard it. I am now far less certain that it really takes care of the interests or the needs of all homeowners. In fact, it will probably be limited to a very small group indeed.

The question of the benefits that are available to mortgage holders is of primary importance. That is the reason for the bill. We find that whatever the initial rate of interest may be, if on renewal it has risen, let us say, 2 points—that is, 200 basis points—from 14 per cent to 16 per cent, then that risk is carried entirely by the person who signed the mortgage. If it goes over the 2 per cent limit, the insurance policy then cuts in to the extent of 75 per cent of the extra payment over the 2 per cent. What does that mean in terms of dollars?

Senator Frith: And up to 10 points.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is right. But surely he is not anticipating that the rate will go over 25 per cent. The mortgage rate today is 15 per cent.

Senator Frith: I am trying to point out that it has that additional limitation. But, again, I am sorry that I brought it up.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is perfectly correct. There is this 10 per cent limitation, but surely that was put in by someone with a high sense of fantasy, because I do not believe that those of us on this side of the house are looking forward to a mortgage interest rate of over 25 per cent. In fact, we are looking for increases of much less than that.

Let us suppose there were a 3 per cent increase, which perhaps is a reasonable expectation as being the ceiling. We were told by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in his speech in Charlottetown the other day that we need not worry about the 20 per cent rates we were looking at a few years ago. And that was repeated by other gentlemen of some authority. It seems to me that a 3 per cent increase in the mortgage rate is not a bad place to start one's calculations. If one has a mortgage for $70,000—that is the maximum one can insure here—and the rate goes up 3 per cent, what does one get out of it? The extra cost of the monthly payment is $151. The insurance premium will cover only $38 of that. So the balance is left to the co-insurer, the mortgage holder, to pay himself. If honourable senators work that out on an annual basis, they will find that the amount of protection is really not great at that rate. So one has to understand what is the extent of the relief. It is that on the basis of a $70,000 mortgage and an increase of 3 per cent in the mortgage rate, the monthly benefit is $38 to be applied against the $151 increase.

I do not belittle that. That in itself is not a bad thing, and I believe the house as a whole would agree that we could not oppose the bill on that ground. But it is necessary to understand just what the weight of this protection really is.

What is the cost? Thirty per cent of mortgages in Canada today are written for a one-year term. If one had such a mortgage, one would pay out $1,070 by way of premium—which is 1.5 per cent on the total of $70,000—and one would get back, on the example I am using, $476. So that does not sound like a very good deal. On a one-year mortgage, one would pay out $1,070 by way of premium and get back $476 by way of protection.

Let us move on. Let us suppose that one had a mortgage with a three-year term—and most of the mortgages in Canada are written for that term. One would still pay the same premium. That is the curious part. It does not matter what the term of the mortgage is, one pays the same premium. The premium is $1,070, and the protection is $1,428. That is looking a little better. If one were a five-year mortgage holder—and 20 per cent of mortgage holders are in that category; it is the smallest category—one would pay out $1,070 and get protection to the extent of $2,380. That looks much better.

So we would have to assume that it is unlikely that anyone who has a term shorter than five years would be much attracted by this protection. Even in that case, if you took your $1,070 and applied it against the principal of your mortgage and took into account the compound interest you would save if you had made that prepayment on the mortgage principal, you would still be just as far ahead as if this bill was never enacted. So I think we have to say that the minister's statement that it suits the needs of all homeowners is, to put it charitably, something of an exaggeration. I am not opposed to this bill and maybe it will do some good but I think that the area in which it will be of some use is rather limited and we should be aware of that fact.

Another point raised in committee was whether or not the insurance plan was self-supporting and, if not, was there an element of subsidy. The government has calculated, according to the information given to us by the sponsor, that a premium of 1.5 per cent should make the plan self-supporting, which is not a bad idea. It seemed to me that we should have an explanation of how that 1.5 per cent premium was arrived at, so I asked the minister and his staff in committee to give us the assumptions on which this 1.5 per cent premium was based, in order to come to some judgment as to whether it was a self-supporting plan. I have to report that I got absolutely no answer from either of the gentlemen present. I asked them the question twice but I thought it would be impolite to ask a third time and so I stopped asking it. We received no answer whatsoever as to how the 1.5 per cent rate was arrived at or what bearing it had on the question of a self-sufficient or subsidized program. In terms of its impact on the budget or on mortgage holders, I am afraid many people will be rather disappointed as the relief provided will not measure up to the early advertising.

Another provision in this bill that deserves mention is one that provides for the establishment of a system of mortgage-backed securities. In other words, companies could sell securities to the investing public based on their mortgage portfolio and the investor would get each month his share of interest and principal. It is considered that this might be an attractive investment. One of the purposes of this proposal was not only to provide that form of investment for the investing public but to increase the pool of money available for home mortgages, which is desirable. I asked some questions about this in committee. My questions were: What are you going to sell this for? What is the spread? These securities will be sold in competition with other securities. If the mortgage rate is 14.75 per cent, which is the rate we used in the committee, I was told that the spread would be 1 per cent. In other words, the people selling these investments to the public—the people handling the bookkeeping conversion and all the rest—would charge 100 basis points or 1 per cent to cover their costs and to pay their staff. That means that the mortgage would be sold to the public at 14.75 per cent minus 1 per cent, which would be 13.75 per cent. When you can buy a Government of Canada bond for 14 per cent right now, it seems to me that the prospects for this mortgage pool are not as bright as one would hope. I am not quite sure what one should do about that because it is not an easy question to settle. However, it seems to me that it is quite likely that the success of this plan as an attractive investment to people who want to put their money in RRSPs or something of that kind may not be very great. I hate to be so negative about this provision but I am really not convinced that it means very much. If I am wrong—and time will tell—I will be glad to admit that my judgment was faulty.

More consideration should be given to the question of a homeowner who has sold his house and taken back a mortgage. Can he contribute his mortgage to this fund and in that way take part in it? Whether or not there is any advantage in his doing so, is perhaps something that needs further investigation. As the situation stands at the present, I think he is out of bounds. It seems to me that if there is any merit in the idea there should be some possibility of including these "take-back" mortgages since a great deal of the mortgage financing in this country is done on that basis. Therefore, a large portion—

Senator Frith: I would not say a large portion of first mortgages are taken back; there are a great many second mortgages taken back as well.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may be right. I would have to agree with him that with respect to first mortgages it would not be such a significant factor. That brings up the point that the whole of the scheme is based on first mortgages which, in turn, is a limiting factor.

None of these considerations will persuade me to oppose the bill because I think it is worth a try. It seems to me that modest claims—and only modest ones—should be made for its effectiveness in helping people who are confronted with increasing mortgage rates. Also, I think only modest expectations should be aroused as to its effectiveness in providing a pool of capital to supply mortgage funds.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that the meeting of the committee which dealt with this bill took place while the Senate was sitting. Therefore, I have to take Senator Roblin's word for what was said, and I do so without hesitation.

Senator Roblin is quite right in his calculations regarding one-year mortgages. However, as mentioned in the speech moving second reading, the hope of the government and the expectation for the plan is that because of the way it will operate in the market it will make longer term mortgages more common. As he quite fairly pointed out, the longer the term of the mortgage the more attractive the scheme becomes.

Senator Roblin: And the higher the rate.

Senator Frith: With respect to the spread between the two, it is an insurance scheme. As Senator Roblin pointed out, in effect the first 2 points are a deductible portion, as happens with many insurance schemes.

With respect to the mortgage-back investments, obviously the government holds more hope for the impact and advantages which will flow from that system in terms of money coming into the market. Senator Phillips asked me a question with respect to the mortgage-back element and I put on the record the three reasons for the government's view that they ought not to be included. Therefore, in general, I find Senator Roblin's assessment of these aspects somewhat pessimistic, and he admits that it is. As Senator Phillips pointed out during the debate on second reading of this bill, I tend to be more optimistic, especially with regard to anything occurring under a Liberal administration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is well put.

Senator Frith: For that reason I have higher hopes for the success of this plan. However, I do agree that if the minister said that this is a scheme which will meet the needs of all homeowners, then that does seem a bit ambitious.

Senator Flynn: It will be interesting to see Senator Frith's perspective after the next election.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Lorna Marsden moved the second reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Financial Administration Act.

She said: Honourable senators, this is my first opportunity to say what an honour it is to join distinguished colleagues on both sides of this chamber as a member of the Senate. I should also like to express my gratitude to the Canadian women from western Canada who fought the Persons case and made it possible for members of my sex to be appointed to this chamber. I hope to be able to make contributions to Parliament and to this country on many issues and in many ways, but it would not be possible to be here to do so if the trail had not been blazed and the principles of equality of opportunity staked out by generations of Canadian women from all walks of life who have fought eloquently and persistently for us all, some of whom are now, or have been, in the Senate.

It is with great pleasure that I speak to Bill C-34, which responds to some of the many needs of workers, men and women, in Canada. I congratulate the Minister of Labour, the Honourable André Ouellet, and his colleagues, for introducing this progressive legislation which opens up the path to improvements in many aspects of working life, and which shows his commitment and that of the government to recognizing the economic realities of the 1980s while advancing the cause of equality in the work place. He reinforces the commitment of the government to safety and health on the job, and this legislation improves the functioning of our industrial relations system, a system which is vital to economic and social progress in Canada.

As honourable senators know, the Canada Labour Code is the main body of federal legislation governing relations between employers and employees. Although only 600,000 workers are subject to the code, it has traditionally shown the way for labour legislation across the country. In other words, the demonstration effect of the code has always been significant.

Honourable senators, I want to congratulate the minister for the extensive consultations he had with various interested groups and individuals. I understand that he, or his officials, met with approximately 40 labour organizations and major employer groups in the country. This process of consultation is particularly important in the area of labour relations where the support of the participants is absolutely crucial for the smooth functioning of the system. The result of these consultations is obvious: We have a bill before us which has substantial public support as evidenced by the willingness of Conservative and New Democratic members of Parliament to act expeditiously on Bill C-34.

Whether we like it or not, western societies will change rapidly in the years ahead. The momentous developments in technology virtually guarantee that. However rapid the pace of change, our job as legislators remains essentially the same—to ensure, among other things, that everyone receives equitable treatment.

One of the ways we can do this is through labour legislation that is responsive, that gives the partners the latitude to resolve their differences themselves and that is consistent with economic and social realities.

One of the social realities of the 1980s is the changing composition of the work force. From 1951 to 1980, the female component of the labour force went from 22.2 per cent to 40.1 per cent. In 1980 the female participation rate edged over 50 per cent. This massive entry of women into the world of work has forced individuals to re-examine their value systems and governments to redesign public policies.

As many people now recognize, breaks in employment due to child bearing and child care reduce seniority levels for women, adversely affect opportunities for their promotion and hinder eligibility for employment benefits. The case, therefore, for the Part III reforms to the code is compelling. They represent a serious effort on the part of the federal government to help workers reconcile the conflict between family and career responsibilities.

I should like now to discuss briefly some of the proposed amendments. At the present time female workers must be with an employer for 12 months before being eligible for pregnancy leave. It is proposed that this qualifying period be reduced to six months as a way of acknowledging the changes which have occurred in female labour-force participation patterns.

In other words, as women continue to display strong employment histories, the need for specifying a lengthy qualifying period in the legislation has become redundant.

Currently, entitlement to leave is confined to pregnant employees. Natural fathers and parents who have adopted children are not eligible for any period of leave to carry out child-care responsibilities. In order to facilitate a sharing of child-care duties, the government proposes an additional 24 weeks of unpaid child-care leave, with entitlement extended to both parents, whether natural or adoptive.

Other changes will protect employees upon their return to work by providing them, while on leave, with seniority accrual, benefit coverage, and entitlement to training and promotion information.

Another major concern the government has addressed is sexual harassment in the work place. A new set of provisions is being proposed to increase employers' involvement in the deterrence of sexual harassment at work. Employers will be required to develop and publicize to their employees a statement of policy which specifically addresses sexual harassment. This policy statement would contain a clear definition of the kinds of conduct considered to constitute sexual harassment, and clearly indicate the employer's intention to make all reasonable efforts, including taking disciplinary action, if necessary, to ensure that sexual harassment does not occur.

I would now like to turn, honourable senators, to the proposed amendments to Part IV of the code concerning occupational safety and health, an area that is unquestionably one of the most important labour issues of today, and requires urgent action on our part. In Canada, figures for 1982 indicate that more than 15 million work days were lost due to accidents at the work place, more than two and a half times as many as were lost due to strikes and lockouts. Compensation costs for industrial injury and disease in Canada reached almost $2 billion in 1981, with indirect costs estimated at an alarming $8 billion. This, in our view, is a totally unacceptable record. The human suffering is obvious and must be addressed as immediately as possible. The economic and productivity consequences are also enormous.

It is vitally important that our society, which places so much emphasis on work and on earning one's own way, make every effort to ensure that its work places are as hazard-free as possible. We must remove the conditions that make work life-diminishing rather than life-enhancing. As legislators, we must display our commitment to the safety and health of our workers.

As a first step, the government is proposing a change in the way safety and health programs are structured. At present, the division of federal legislative authority among numerous statutes leads to uncertainty and to a patchwork of protection. Eliminating this fragmentation has been repeatedly called for by, among others, the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Regulatory Reform, the Economic Council of Canada and many labour organizations.

To meet this need, the bill will extend equal rights for occupational safety and health to all employees in the federal jurisdiction, meaning some 300,000 additional workers. The government is proposing, in effect, that Part IV be extended to cover employees on ships, aircraft and trains, those operating interprovincial pipelines and those drilling for oil and gas off our coasts and in the north. I should add that existing procedures for ensuring operating and public safety will remain unchanged.

As well, through amendments to the Financial Administration Act, the federal government will cease to be a self-regulating employer. For the first time, the government, as an employer, will be subject to the obligations imposed by Parliament, and federal public servants will benefit from the same rights as employees in the private sector.

Bill C-34 also calls for more active worker and management participation in the monitoring and enforcement processes in safety and health matters. It calls for the establishment of more effective communications systems in the work place, to ensure that the "voice of concern" on health and safety is heard, and that corrective action is taken.

The new provisions concerning safety and health representatives and mandatory labour-management committees are two examples of how this increased participation and responsibility are to be effected. The proposal to establish a national advisory council on occupational safety and health clearly demonstrates the government's intent to guarantee all interested parties not merely a voice, but a significant role in the formulation of policy, as well as in the regulatory and program development process. In all work places where more than 20 persons are employed, workers and managers will sit jointly as members of safety and health committees and, in smaller offices and workshops, workers will be able to speak through an officially appointed safety and health representative.

Members of the national advisory council will be appointed from the employee and employer sectors to provide advice directly to the Minister of Labour.

In essence, the revised act emphasizes the need for the resolution of safety and health problems in the work place by those most directly affected, namely, employers and employees.

Another amendment to Part IV concerns the right to refuse work in cases of unacceptable danger. When it was proposed that employees should be given the right to refuse work dangerous to their safety or health, there was concern that the right might be abused. The wording of the act was, therefore, chosen very carefully to limit the possibility of abuse.

Experience in both the federal and provincial jurisdictions has shown that workers have utilized the provision in a responsible manner. The wording of Part IV, however, particularly the expression, "imminent danger," has created confusion as to what work can or cannot be refused. In the interests of clarity, the qualifier, "imminent," has been dropped, and a definition of "danger" added.

As well, the provisions dealing with normal occupational hazards and situations where public safety precludes the exercise of this right have been re-worded to ensure compatibility with the extended scope of application.

The enforcement provisions and the policy for administering them have been revised, with the goal of enhancing compliance with Part IV and thereby preventing occupational injuries and illness.

Honourable senators, I should like to turn now to the proposed amendments to Part V of the Labour Code, that is, those changes dealing with industrial relations and collective bargaining.

I want, first, to emphasize our faith in the collective bargaining process as the best method for working Canadians to secure some form of economic democracy and to gain a fair and just wage. Without a doubt, it is one of the great social inventions of our time.

Of course, there can sometimes be a good deal of tension surrounding the negotiating table, but this is not necessarily bad. It seems to me that the clash of demands that occurs at the bargaining table is primarily an indication of the quality of work place democracy, not a sign of social breakdown. In any event, in a free society, would it be realistic to establish rules for the elimination of conflict? I think not.

Government need not stand idly by and watch as the economic partners go at each other. On the contrary, it can and should try to improve the framework within which collective bargaining is conducted. It can also root out some of the causes of industrial strife. This is a proper role for government.

With respect to the Canada Labour Relations Board, the bill proposes a number of administrative changes in order to unclog the system and reduce the amount of red tape with which parties must contend.

Bill C-34 also makes changes to the fair representation clause of the code. At present, this clause requires that unions represent all members of the bargaining unit fairly. This is not unreasonable, considering that individuals and minorities within larger groups always require the provision of protection.

However, there is a need to balance the rights of the individual with the rights of the organization. In recent years, the grievance arbitration systems have become cluttered as individual union members have resorted, in increasing numbers, to the fair representation clause of the code. To remedy this, the amendment proposes to adopt the proscriptive language used in some provincial jurisdictions, which simply stipulates that unions must not act in a manner that is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith in the representation of the employees. Despite this change, I am confident that the rights of the individual union member are secure.

Another reform that the Minister of Labour is proposing has to do with technological change. Under the new arrangement, employers will have to give bargaining agents a minimum of 120 days' notice of their intention to introduce a technological change. This is an increase from the 90 days' notice presently required. In addition, the union will be able to request further details of the planned change from the employer.

Honourable senators, we should not underestimate the importance of these changes. I think they represent a clear indication on the part of the government that it will not allow workers to be swamped by the tidal wave of technology, and that, despite the desirability of technological advance, it wants employers to consult fully with those who will be most affected by it.

The final amendment I would mention requires the inclusion in all collective agreements of a compulsory union dues check-off clause. Commonly called the "Rand Formula", such clauses require all employees in a bargaining unit to pay an amount equal to regular trade union dues through payroll deduction, whether or not they are members of the trade union which represents the bargaining unit. We have also agreed to propose a "conscience clause" in the context to permit bona fide religious objectors to direct an amount otherwise payable as union dues to a recognized charity.

The business community has not been as effusive in welcoming this measure as some of us on this side of the chamber, but I believe it will come to realize the social necessity of the reforms and adapt accordingly, for it is in the employers' own interest to have a collective bargaining system that functions smoothly and a work force that feels its legitimate needs are being met.

In sum, I am convinced that the amendments under discussion today represent ideas whose time has come.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-33, intituled: "An Act to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act".—(Honourable Senator Argue P. C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this matter will have to stand until later today. Senator Argue seems to be otherwise engaged at the moment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does the honourable senator mean that the cabinet meeting is not over yet?

Senator Frith: I have no idea; I am not a member of cabinet.

Senator Flynn: No, but you should know why the minister is not here.

Senator Frith: The minister was here earlier. I have no idea why he is not here now. He must have been called out on urgent state business.

Senator Flynn: He must be unavoidably absent.

Senator Frith: The problem facing us is that the sponsor of Bill C-32 also is not in the chamber. I suppose everyone thought that Senator Muir was good for a stout half hour's speech and planned accordingly. Perhaps Senator Macdonald would be ready to proceed with one of the orders standing in his name and we can revert to these bills when their champions return.

Order stands.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to order No. 8. I was getting rather nervous; I thought I would not have an opportunity to do so.

At this late date I doubt whether there is much, if anything, I can add to what has already been said either in support of or against the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform, but I thought I should mention why I do not support all of its recommendations. Before discussing the matter, I would like to say how impressed I was—and I am sure all honourable senators were—by the work of the committee. Its members undertook and accomplished a great deal of work. Whether one agrees with the committee's conclusions or not, one must be impressed by the sheer volume and depth of its study and research. The joint committee certainly took its mandate seriously and tried to obtain the views of a good cross-section of the Canadian people on this important matter, although I am afraid it only had moderate or, indeed, indifferent success.

Honourable senators, I was interested in how the committee accomplished this. They did so by holding public meetings and by receiving written and oral briefs from persons, organizations and societies. The report of the committee shows that public hearings were held in the capital city of each province and of each territory. Eleven hearings were held in Ottawa. The committee heard testimony from 118 witnesses, whose names are listed in Appendix B of the report. Among the witnesses were 15 senators and 3 former senators, as well as 22 professors from 16 universities. I believe that all of these were professors of political science and they spoke with some authority from an academic point of view. I thought it somewhat strange that more universities were not represented. In Nova Scotia, for example, professors from only two of our universities testified, and both of these were from the city of Halifax.

Hon. C. William Doody: Shame!

Senator Macdonald: That meant that six other universities were not represented. But then, I thought, there must have been good reason for that; I expect that they had more urgent matters to be concerned about.

I know that in my own part of Nova Scotia, what is known as industrial Cape Breton, our most pressing problem and concern is our economic situation. The evil of unemployment, which is affecting at least 30 per cent of our work force, is considered to be vastly more important than tinkering with the legislative process of our country. I can tell honourable senators that while this condition prevails—while we are suffering from the economic and social evils which accompany high unemployment—we are not going to be diverted from our concern or anxiety about unemployment and its effects by talking of Senate reform or any other reform.

Honourable senators, we believe that first things should come first and should be dealt with first. Senate reform is not what we consider to be a high priority.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have mentioned that I thought that the committee, in spite of all its efforts, was only moderately successful in obtaining a good cross-section of views of the Canadian people. It seems to me that the response to its invitation to give testimony was not accepted by what might be called the ordinary, average Canadian citizen. There is a preponderance of testimony from the academic community and from organizations and societies of various kinds, but I do not think they represent a substantial cross-section of the Canadian public. I suspect that there is reason for this. I suspect that the main reason why more did not respond to the committee's invitation is that there is no great dissatisfaction with an appointed Senate and its activities. I suspect that an appointed Senate is still regarded as a safeguard—as a protection against the possible misuse of power by a tyrannical executive or an emotionally charged House of Commons.

● (1430)

In any event, honourable senators, in order to obtain some indication of where the interest in Senate reform was most apparent, I looked at appendix C of the report. It lists 280 written briefs or letters received by the committee. My breakdown of those by province of origin showed that 4 came from Newfoundland, 5 from Prince Edward Island, 11 from Nova Scotia, 4 from New Brunswick, 26 from Quebec, and 116 from Ontario. There were 10 from Manitoba, 49 from Alberta, 14 from Saskatchewan, 33 from British Columbia, 4 from Yukon and 2 from the Northwest Territories. In case someone should add those up and be missing two, I should explain that two came from Australia.

[Senator Macdonald.]

So I take it from those figures that the idea of changing or replacing the Senate by a new body with the same name did not generate a great deal of interest anywhere. I can understand that more interest would be shown in the western provinces from the point of view of their being entitled to more senators than they now have in an unreformed Senate. In any event, while giving the committee full marks for attempting to obtain the views of a large cross-section of the Canadian people, in my view they were not successful in doing so, and the sample of public opinion that it had was too small for it to make a finding based on the views obtained.

Honourable senators, the main or principal recommendation of the subcommittee can be found in the very first sentence of chapter 1, which I quote as follows:

We have concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada.

It is of interest to note that it is acknowledged that while a substantial part of the testimony favoured direct election, an equally substantial part of the testimony opposed it, and in my opinion, not too much consideration was given to the opposing point of view.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Personally, I am against an elected Senate, and I will explain why. In order to do so, I looked first at the purpose of the Senate, which is set out on page 7 in chapter 3 of the report. I quote as follows:

The Senate was created in 1867 to fill not one but two major roles in the new federation. One was to protect and represent, so far as federal legislation was concerned, what Sir John A. Macdonald called "sectional interests".

Sectional interests include those interests peculiar to a region or to a linguistic or religious group. In this report we use the more familiar term 'regional interests'. The other major role was to help ensure political stability by acting as a counterweight to the popularly elected House of Commons.

Over the years the Senate came to fulfill the role of improving legislation and of investigating matters of public importance. This, or course, is a very useful function and one that is highly commendable; but it is not part of the original duty of the Senate. According to the report, the Senate is no longer fulfilling its major purposes of regional representation, and the primary objective of the committee's report is to strengthen the Senate's capacity to fill that role.

I now quote from page 13 of the report, as follows:

To meet our primary objective, any reform should ensure that senators have more political authority and a measure of independence from party discipline. However, we also consider it essential that the House of Commons continue to be the pre-eminent chamber in Parliament, so that our system of responsible government can continue to operate effectively. Finally, our overriding concern is to ensure that Senate reform will strengthen the authority of Parliament as a whole to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country.

Honourable senators, even after reading that passage several times, I found it difficult to follow its meaning. It sounds most impressive, but personally I cannot see that the adoption of the proposed recommendation would or could have that effect.

I believe there is some considerable difference between the work or role of the Senate to protect and represent, so far as federal legislation is concerned, regional interests such as linguistic or religious groups, and the committee's understanding that the role of the Senate is to give regional representation in our parliamentary system. I believe that the members of the House of Commons are sent to Parliament to represent the regions which elected them, and it appears to be implied in the report that they have not done so. It is also at least implied that they have not done so on account of party discipline. I find that most extraordinary, because it implies two things: first, that a government would deliberately sponsor legislation that was detrimental to some parts of the country; and, secondly, that the members of the House of Commons from the region affected would vote for it, or at least not vote against it. Such thinking fails to take into account that the members of the House of Commons must be re-elected. If they did not properly represent the people who voted for them, they would be defeated at the following election.

Of course, the same reasoning would not apply to the proposed elected Senate. Those elected would not be seeking re-election and would be responsible to no one. In that regard, they would be in exactly the same position as an appointed senator, except that their term of office could be a good deal shorter.

Honourable senators, I gather from the report that an elected Senate would do what an elected House of Commons cannot do, which is to fulfill the role of regional representation; and it would be able to do so because there is to be no party discipline, and no pressure from the government whip. Why? Because such senators would be elected for a nine-year non-renewable term. Such a senator would be responsible to no one; he or she would not have to justify his or her actions to those who voted for him or her; he or she would be given a blind trust; and he or she would be responsible to no one for his or her actions or votes.

In addition, it seems to me that the report suggests that there is always to be a perpetual conflict of interest between the federal and provincial governments. I do not believe that is so. However, I do believe that with an elected Senate responsible to no one, there is grave danger that there could well be perpetual conflict not only between the federal government and the various regions, but also among the regions themselves. I have only a few more pages of notes.

An Hon. Senator: You are doing well, John.

An Hon. Senator: Put a little fire into it.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I believe that the committee has wholly misjudged the results, if adopted, of their proposals in stating that reform of the Senate would strengthen the authority of Parliament as a whole to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country. Personally I believe that the adoption of those proposals would have exactly the opposite effect.

I can understand the point of view of those who want an elected Senate. They want the Senate to receive its authority directly from the voters. They feel that senators can only speak with authority equal to that of members of the House of Commons if they are elected. Yet, honourable senators, it is not proposed that the Senate shall be equal to the House of Commons; and, indeed, under our present parliamentary system, it could never be so. Of course, a person running for the Senate, after obtaining a nomination, would have the same need for the support of a political party as would a candidate for election to the House of Commons; also, I expect that a senator elected through the support of a political party would feel under some obligation to that party and would not be independent of party discipline, despite the view set out in the report. Honourable senators, over the years there has grown a need for more and more consultation between the federal and provincial authorities, especially when there is divided or shared jurisdiction in various fields. To fill that need there has developed the holding of federal-provincial conferences. The report suggests an elected Senate could represent the provinces and relieve them of that responsibility. I do not think that that is so and I do not see the provincial premiers being willing to have even elected senators speak on their behalf. In fact, I have seen nothing that would indicate that the premiers are full of gratitude for the solicitude shown them by the report.

I am not one who believes an elected Senate would strengthen our parliamentary system. Indeed, I think the committee itself must have had some misgivings because I noticed that in certain cases it wanted a double majority before a measure could be passed. In other words, the committee was afraid an elected Senate would not be as concerned to protect minority rights as is an appointed Senate. I think it has to be acknowledged that an elected Senate would be a sort of miniature House of Commons with, of course, less power; some kind of minor body. So if an appointed Senate no longer fulfils its obligations, if it has outlived its usefulness and a new elected body with the old name were to be an important part of our parliamentary system by complementing or supplementing the House of Commons, then, instead of electing senators, I suggest that additional members be elected to the House of Commons. If you want to get away from party discipline I suggest members of the House of Commons take an oath of office stating that they will not be partisan or supportive of the party which helped put them there.

In all seriousness, I suggest that the recommendations in the report, if adopted, could be accomplished by simply adding to the membership of the House of Commons. If the proposal for an elected Senate were to be adopted, then I think there should first be a study as to whether a Senate is necessary. Let us get right down to fundamentals. I know the report mentions in passing that the witnesses appeared to be in general agreement that there should be a Senate. However, that question was not examined as it was not part of the committee's mandate.

Honourable senators, I believe an appointed Senate is a necessary part of our parliamentary system. I do not believe that an elected Senate is a necessary part of our parliamentary system. Of course, I am not saying there is no room for some improvement.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Thank God!

Senator Macdonald: I know there can be internal reform and that there should be. I agree with the proposal that the Senate should elect its own Speaker, though I do not think it would make one bit of difference in the long run.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Macdonald: I know, too, that the Senate has a poor public image, if that is the proper word to use. I suppose we deserve it. I think the image of the Senate is made right here in the Senate Chamber.

Senator Flynn: Alas!

Senator Macdonald: No matter how much worthwhile work is done by our committees, it is not seen by the public. But when the galleries are filled with, for example, school children and they see less than half the Senate seats filled, that does affect our image. Of course, it is said, and with truth, that our attendance compares very favourably with that of members of the House of Commons. We must remember that every day for an hour or so the House of Commons puts on public entertainment so spectators see a well filled chamber with members speaking on matters of current interest. But in many cases, once that period is over the spectators leave the Commons and come over to the Senate and they are not impressed.

Honourable senators, I make two suggestions as to how we could improve the public perception of the Senate. One is that we raise our quorum from the present number of 15, which would not be too hard to do, and the other is that we do not try to sit every week. In the past the Senate would meet when there was work for it to do. I say that we should meet one week per month. We are not helping anything by saying we have to be here because the House of Commons may pass a bill and want it passed right away. I think these two suggestions would improve our image with the public.

While I appreciate and commend the members of the joint committee for their work, perhaps you have guessed, I cannot support the main recommendation that senators be elected. I think this recommendation is not only wrong in principle but it would be cumbersome and unworkable in practice and would result in a poor parliamentary system. I am convinced that an appointed Senate is a necessary, valuable part of our parliamentary system and I believe that if an appointed Senate is to be changed to an elected Senate, we should seriously consider whether or not we need a Senate at all. If there is to be an elected Senate my own view is that there should first be a choice between an elected Senate and no Senate. I, for one, would go for no Senate rather than for an elected Senate, because I believe it would be better to abolish the Senate than to have one elected with the functions suggested in the report.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Honourable senators, as you may have gathered from my remarks, I do not think the report of the joint committee should be adopted—quite the contrary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: If no one else wishes to adjourn the debate I would like to do so, because I may speak next fall if the present session resumes.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Let's have a vote right now.

Senator Flynn: By that time I will probably have some arguments on top of the ones I have now about the appointments we are all waiting for.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) moved the second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act. As you know, this bill passed the House of Commons with the unanimous approval of the members of that house.

• (1450)

The Western Grain Stabilization Act is the main federal program to support the incomes of prairie grain producers. The general objective of the Western Grain Stabilization Program is to protect grain producers in the Canadian Wheat Board designated area against unexpected declines in net returns due to short-term price fluctuations, reduced marketings and increased production costs.

The program protects actual producers of grain within the Canadian Wheat Board region collectively. Under the Western Grain Stabilization Program, net cash flow for each calendar year is supported at the average of the net cash flow in the previous five years. Net cash flow is the difference between gross grain receipts and cash expenses, with adjustments for costs related to grain not sold and receipts which are not eligible for coverage under the program.

In any year in which net cash flow falls below the previous five-year average, the difference, adjusted for the level of producer participation in the program, is paid to producers. Each participating producer shares in any payout on the basis of the amount of levy paid in that year and the two previous years in proportion to the levies paid by all participating producers in those years.

The program covers seven major grains and oil seeds grown in the Canadian Wheat Board area—wheat, barley, oats, rye, flaxseed, canola and mustard seed.

The program is voluntary to the extent that new producers can withdraw during their first three years. Also, I might say that it is voluntary in the sense that they have to elect to go into the program at this time. The level of participation has generally been on an upward trend. Some people say the program is not popular and that producers would like to get out en masse. However, the fact is that there is a general upward trend in the percentage of farmers who are in the program. The percentage now is at a level of 77 per cent, which is a solid endorsement of the popularity of the program. Perhaps more important as an indication of the popularity of the program, 80 to 85 per cent of new permit book holders have stayed in the program.

Producers' levy rates this year were reduced to 1.5 per cent from the normal 2 per cent to a maximum of $900. I might also say that the normal payment into the fund is 2 per cent of the gross receipts by farmers today up to a maximum of $60,000. For each $1 a producer pays into the fund, the federal government pays $2 into the fund. The fund accumulates interest at the rate of 90 per cent of the government rate on 90-day treasury bills. The fund has built up to a considerable sum.

There has been a good deal of criticism with respect to the operation of the act because, although producers have been going through rather tough times in the last two or three years, there has not been a payment made under the act during the last five years. However, I should point out that producers who are in the fund have been well advised to stay in it. As I said, their equity has been increasing. In 1977 and 1978 producers received payments totalling $368 million.

The government is proposing some major amendments to the legislation. The first is with respect to the addition of a second payout triggering mechanism. Net cash flow per tonne of eligible earnings will be supported at the level of the previous five years. This payout mechanism will make the program more sensitive to price and cost variations during periods of increasing marketings.

The existing payment mechanism is also being retained in the event that the volume of marketings declines. In any year in which both mechanisms trigger a payout then producers will receive the larger of the two payout amounts. Thus, being placed into the act is a second trigger which says that the net cash flow in a given year will be divided by the marketings in that year. To some extent this will offset the disadvantage of the first trigger only, whereby a large increase in marketings can increase the net cash flow. As is the case without the amendment, this has resulted in no payments whatsoever being made in the 1983 calendar year.

The second change is to measure receipts by crop year as opposed to calendar year, and to calculate payouts for crop years. This will allow the program to respond more quickly in that stabilization payouts will be made three or four months after the end of the crop year rather than after ten months, as was the case with the calendar year.

In addition, this change will mean that the receipts from the sale of a crop will be related to the costs of producing that crop. For example, if the costs that went into the 1983 crop were incurred basically in 1983, then the return is from the 1983 crop, which is related to 1983 costs.

The way the program works at the present time is that expenses are calculated on a calendar year basis. In order to be exceptionally fair, under the act a survey is made of the actual costs of thousands of grain producers for the previous year. The Statistics Canada index is not considered in order to do a quick calculation; instead, they wait until approximately 10,000 farmers have filed their income tax returns on April 30. Then, one or two months later, after the farmer has finished seeding, and he has a little time and will not shoot the first person who comes into the yard because he is too busy, they go out and ask the farmer what his actual expenses were. I am told that this is done in June and July. When the calculations are finally made it is some eight months into the new calendar year. Thus, if we move the income payments from the calendar year to the crop year it means that in 1983 we look at the calendar year for expenses, and we look at the 1983-84 crop year for income receipts. The crop year ends on July 31. It takes a couple of months after that to complete the calculations and to make the cheques available. In this way payments can be in the mail to the farmer toward the end of October or November. The belief is that in this way payouts will be made more quickly since they will come shortly after the end of the crop year.

The third change is an amendment which will give participants the option of withdrawing. Many people have felt they should not be locked into a plan forever while they are farming; they should be able to get out of it. The amendment will provide that effective August 1, 1986, all those producers who have been in the plan for ten years—and the plan will have been in effect for ten years at that time—can opt out. My hope and belief is that with the act being made more sensitive to and working in the interests of the producers they will see that they have received much more from participating in the plan than they would if they had been excluded. Thus, they will stay with the provisions provided in the act. However, every ten years there will be an opportunity for producers to withdraw.

The fourth amendment is that spouses who are members of farm partnerships, co-operatives or companies and are involved in the farming operation will be eligible to participate in the program. Although this change could result in some increase in the cost of the program to the government, the change will remove a discriminatory restriction. I think everyone will welcome the fact that under this proposed legislation a spouse in partnership with a husband or wife will be eligible to make payments into the fund and to receive payments from the fund. I think that all in all the amendments are very helpful and will improve the operation of the act.

The act is amended so that in the present year an interim payment can be made, and the government has announced that an interim payment will be made. The amendment does not, however, provide for interim payments for the future. It is difficult to assess the amount of interim payments because it is difficult to project the amount that will be paid out before all of the grain has been delivered in a given year. As a farmer, I do not think it does a great deal to assist me as a producer in averaging out my income to have an unknown amount of interim payment made perhaps two or three months in advance of a final payment. The main thing is for producers to know in advance how their income may be staggered over a year. Right now a producer can expect, because of what has happened in the past, that towards the end of January or early February, he or she will receive final payments on the Canadian Wheat Board pools—wheat, oats and barley—and usually the payments have been rather substantial. Last year the total payment was some $409 million. A farmer, then, can market his grain as the quotas become available from February on, starting with that point of the year, and often as spring comes and Thunder Bay opens up, the quotas become larger and there is a greater opportunity to deliver grain.

Usually, July is a very high delivery month. The Wheat Board does everything to fill up the elevator system before the crop year ends. July 31 is the last day of the crop year, and very often, in wheat board and farmers' terminology, it is a long day. If the cars are coming in and there is space in the elevator, it is accepted as a reasonable practice that in the first few days and even up to the first couple of weeks of August producers who take their grain to that elevator will receive a cash ticket or a storage ticket, if they prefer it, dated July 31. It is therefore completely impossible to know in advance in any precise way the amount of grain that will be delivered into the system. In addition to that difficulty, there is the whole question of whether prices are going up or down. With this particular measure before us, a lot of the calculations that went into the estimates of the moneys that will be paid under the act were taken early in this calendar year when the total deliveries and prices for the balance of the year were obviously unknown and could only be projected. Prices since have increased substantially, and deliveries also have been high. Therefore, the payments that will be made, although uncertain, could be less than forecast.

With the strengthening of grain prices generally, and good deliveries, farmers have received a larger income from the sale of grain than was anticipated earlier in the crop year.

I think the amendments are necessary. They are good amendments and they will help sensitize the legislation in the interests of the producers. An amount of $884 million had accumulated in the fund by December 31. With respect to payments into the fund, the government pays in about $130 million a year; the farmers pay in about $50 million a year; interest is approximately $60 million a year, and unless this kind of legislation is passed, even though the farmers need the money today, the fund will go on building and building.

No one can say precisely at this stage whether these amendments will do the entire job that we hope they will. All I can say is that, with this legislation, as I suppose with any other legislation, undoubtedly some day additional amendments will be required and I hope that whenever amendments are made, both now and in the future, legislators will keep in mind the needs of the producers in order to make sure that their payments into this fund result in some real protection and payments to producers in time of need. I believe that this is a time of need.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to see Bill C-33 finally before us. I want to thank the honourable minister for his part in bringing this bill to fruition.

In order to give you a little background on this bill, I would like to tell you that the requests for Bill C-33 have come more and more frequently over the period of the last year and a half. As early as last summer in the other place the Conservative Party called for an interim payment for farmers from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. In fact, they have been consistently calling for that interim payment for over a year. In that regard, at page 4055 in the House of Commons Debates of May 25, 1984, Mr. Gustafson from Saskatchewan enumerated the times that this interim payment had been requested. He said that the record would show that on September 16, 1983, he himself had called for the payment; that on October 5, the honourable member for Crowfoot, Mr. Malone, had called for the payment; that on October 7 there was a call for the western grain stabilization payment, and that again on October 25 the Conservative members called for a payment under the act. On November 17, Mr. Taylor, the honourable member for Bow River, who knows farming well, called in the house for a payment.

On December 8, 1983, in this session, there was another call for a payment from this fund by the honourable member for Portage-Marquette, Mr. Mayer, who is the agricultural representative for the Conservative Party in the other place. The list continues on and on. Finally on May 11 of this year Bill C-33 emerged.

I am told on good authority that the Agriculture Committee in the other place worked diligently and didn't put blocks in the way. Good amendments were introduced, but they were not accepted. Realizing the crucial situation in which the farmers find themselves, and in order not to stall the passage of the bill, they agreed to the bill with four amendments that were brought forth. The timing of presenting this bill to the Senate makes it impossible for us to question the minister in committee, as I am sure the members of the committee would like to do.

Honourable senators, the bill does not reflect the realities of production of grains; it does not address rising interest rates; it does not address the cost of fuel, machinery, fertilizers and herbicides; it does not take into consideration the cost of building farmsteads or the other expenses farmers have; it does not permit the possibility of using good soil conservation practices. Those are the kinds of expenses that farmers are faced with.

It is easier for a farmer to borrow money when the grain is in the swath, or at least growing in the fields. It is when the farmer plants the seed that he needs the fertilizer, the fuel, the herbicides, pesticides and fungicides in order to help the crop grow. It is then that the money is required.

The minister has told us that the money will come after the crop year. He also said something about a quick calculation. I hope that the government uses modern methods of calculation so that these payments will not be made as late as November. Computers can give instant print-outs showing what the situation is. It is my hope that there will be a faster calculation so that those payments are made at the end of the crop year and the farmer receives his due.

I should like to put on record how this money has totalled $1 billion. When this bill was debated in the House of Commons, Mr. Gustafson stated, as reported at page 4055 of Hansard, "Farmers have paid into the program since 1979." They have paid into it since 1976, but they have not received any payments since 1978. Mr. Gustafson went on to say:

Farmers initially paid $500 per year. Then it was increased to $900 per year. Then it was increased to $1,200 per year. But since 1979, there has not been a payment to farmers. If a farmer began paying into the program in 1979, by now he would have paid the maximum of $5,700 and he has not received any return. The accumulated interest on that $5,700 amounts to over $8,000 of the farmer's own money. Do not let any Member or Minister on the Government side stand in his place and tell the farmers how much money the Government is paying to them.

The government is going to turn over some $3 million. In my estimation that amount does not even total what they have paid into it. Mr. Gustafson went on to state:

The Government is not returning the money which belongs to the farmers.

So there it is. The minister has stated that the farmer's equity is increasing but what good is equity when the farmer cannot use it, and what good is equity after the farmer has gone bankrupt?

Because farmers need help and because we want to give them that help, we are supporting this bill. The amendments have improved the substance of this bill. My only regret is that the bill could not have been further improved. It is a welcome improvement to see that spouses are eligible to participate on a multiple basis. That is a worthwhile amendment and is something that could have been allowed sooner.

I could go on and on, honourable senators, but I will not take up the Senate's time. I shall conclude by saying that we support this bill because it is of some help and will cause to return to the farmers some of the money that has been accumulating over all of these years.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Argue speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the second reading of this bill.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Bielish's remarks and her general indication of support for the legislation. I can understand her pointing out where she feels the legislation may lack in substance.

The figures used in the other place by Mr. Gustafson were for a producer who came into the fund immediately after pay-outs were made and was in for five years. I should like to give you figures as to how the fund has operated for the vast majority of farmers who signed up when the fund came into effect. If a farmer signed up when the fund came into existence at the beginning of 1976, the amount of moneys paid by that farmer who is paying the maximum would total $6,300, and the payments received from the fund for that farmer paying the maximum would total $6,895. That farmer is $595 better off but that does not take into account any interest return. So that producer, if he had not been in the fund and was getting nothing more, undoubtedly would have been better off not to have seen the fund, but, nonetheless, in total dollars the payments received were somewhat higher than those paid in.

The amendments are now being proposed because that is the situation and because the costs are going up.

Senator Bielish said that with modern accounting equipment we should be able to make the payments earlier. Those responsible for implementing the western grain stabilization program are public servants who are doing the best job they can. As I explained, the farmer delivers his grain to the elevator perhaps as late as August 14. The accounts have to come from the elevator system to the western grain stabilization program offices where they are put through their computers. The indications are that it will take up to six or eight weeks before the cheques can be mailed. It is estimated that the payments would be made towards the end of October or early November. I believe that now the Canadian Wheat Board can send out their cheques in four weeks. They are the people who buy the grain and their figures come in almost instantaneously, especially with the new systems in place with some of the country elevators. In any event, the waiting period here is approximately two to three months. Without any amendment the waiting time was ten months. Obviously, ten months is longer than three months so I think that is a major improvement. When I hear somebody complaining that these are not the right kind of amendments, my answer to that is that if there had been no amendments there would not have been a single dollar paid on 1983 crops. Therefore, these amendments are improving the legislation.

Senator Bielish, who is a farmer, said that farmers need money in the spring. I am a farmer, too, and I say that farmers need money every day of the year because the accounts come in and the bills have to be paid. It used to be that the only time you fertilized your fields was in the spring. Now the practice is to fertilize in the fall, so that some of the costs that were high in the spring are now high in the fall. A farmer gets by when it comes to seeding in the spring and harvesting in the fall with credit from the local fuel merchant, the fertilizer merchant, the storekeeper and so on. When fall comes, he tries to have money on hand to pay the bills that have accumulated throughout the summer. Part of the reason for doubling the cash advances is to help the producer do that. As a producer, I think that the money is as good to me on November 1 as it would be on March 1. In any event, the final payments have come out from the previous crop year around February 1. The main feature of this bill is that the producers will know where they stand, and under this legislation payments will come more readily in the future.

Senator Bielish said that certain costs are not taken into account. Well, some of these costs are taken into account because they are operating costs such as fuel costs, herbicide costs, repairs and so on. It is correct that interest rates are not taken into account; it is correct that capital depreciation is not taken into account. The argument is that you should not encourage the producer unnecessarily to buy a lot of farm machinery because it will be used as an expense item under this bill. The main problem is created by the interest costs, and the so-called experts in the banking system—the deep thinkers—said to the producers five or six years ago that they should expand their land, borrow money from the banks in order to buy more land. The producers said “the banks must know what they are doing so we will follow them.” They expanded, bought more land, had more mortgages to pay and the interest rates went up. This bill does not provide for the inclusion of interest costs and I think there is an argument for that, but in a sense it does not matter whether you provide for them or not. The main point is that you have to tailor the legislation so that when the farmer puts in his money and the government matches it and at some time the farmer needs it, then the farmer will get his payments. I think that is what we are endeavouring to do in introducing this legislation. It is a vast improvement compared with what we have had up to now. I do not apologize for the slowness with which it came to Parliament because, as you will see, whether we received the bill and passed it today, or whether we had received and passed it two or four months ago, the earliest the final payment for this year can be made is November 1. Therefore, we are right on target in getting it done.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have been following the practice of not abridging the rules for third reading if there is no particular reason to do so such as Royal Assent. We do not have Royal Assent planned for today, so I think we should follow the “Flynn formula,” as we have come to call it, and, accordingly, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA LABOUR CODE FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

[Senator Argue.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sinclair, for the second reading of Bill C-34, intituled: “An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Financial Administration Act”.—(Honourable Senator Muir).

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-34. Before doing so, I should like to express my commendation and best wishes to Senator Marsden who delivered a clear, concise explanation of the bill. You could hear her throughout the chamber. She did not mumble; she spoke in perfect English, and she knew what she was talking about which I think is very important. In many democracies, and in many parliamentary institutions whether Senates, Houses of Commons or Congress, so many people do not know what they are talking about. That happens on occasion even in my own case. In any event, she spoke eloquently. She spoke of the amendments and changes that had been made, the co-operation of the Official Opposition and the NDP; she spoke about safety and health, the conscience clause, religious convictions, the Rand formula and so on. However, you are going to be disappointed if I continue in that vein as you are not used to hearing me being so kind. It is really out of character.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are weakening!

Senator Muir: Am I getting mellow? Oh, no.

My first comments on this bill are in the nature of a complaint. There are those in the other place who complained that the bill was introduced at the last minute and with even greater justification we make the same complaint. It seems so unusual that when governments of whatever stripe have an adjournment, an Easter recess or a Christmas recess they then start pouring in the legislation saying: “You be good boys and girls. Get this legislation through and we will let you go back home.” I do not think that that is our role here. We should deal as best we can in a proper way with the legislation we receive.

The government has talked about this type of legislation since 1981. It has taken over three years to deliver itself of quite significant but somewhat flawed legislation.

This bill was given first reading in the other place on May 15; but the debate on second reading did not commence until June 11, and that lasted only a few hours. Of course, the bill was then referred to committee, and the committee did a little better than the house in that it considered the bill over several meetings.

It is not because organized labour or the Public Service Alliance, in particular, is eager and anxious to see legislation passed that members of Parliament—and in that term I include senators—should abdicate their responsibilities. Worthy as these causes may be, I think time should be taken to go into all the phases and facets of any legislation. Bill C-34 is 55 pages long and contains 42 clauses, and I do not think it has been given the study it should have been given. Changes were made in the other place, so there was room for improvement. I believe there is still room for improvement. Had more time been available to study the bill and hear witnesses, I am sure a better bill would have been the outcome. However, as the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate said yesterday, this government has a very unfortunate attitude towards amendments. Its collective ego is so pathetically frail that it damn near collapses when it has to admit that there are errors or shortcomings in any of its legislation. That is truly unfortunate because, working together, we should produce better legislation. It is unfortunate because this weakness has resulted, all too often, in our being deprived of the opportunity to improve upon laws destined to improve the conditions of life under which our fellow citizens will have to live.

Here again we have an example of how not to legislate. A bill of this magnitude and importance should never be sent to either house in the dying days or the dying hours of a session. I do not think that is a sensible way to run any country.

Perhaps the problem is that this government labours under a fundamental misconception that the quality lacking in its legislation can be made up for by the quantity. Perhaps they feel that, by bringing in a catalogue of legislation, which we do not have time to analyze, they will brainwash the public into thinking that they are doing a fantastic job.

For many years of its tenure, this government, in keeping with its stated philosophy, has drowned the nation in laws. That is why we have often faced the situation we are now facing of passing legislation at the last minute without having the opportunity of getting down to the basic fundamentals of the proposed laws. As it is we are in the situation of having one presented on top of the other. When they are whittled down, it may be that many of them mean the same thing.

Honourable senators, I hope that when we return after the summer recess—I presume someone is going to call an election—a new government will be in charge and that the leader of that government will be a man in favour of smaller and more efficient government. That is a cherished philosophical principle, not a hot public relations scam latched on to because it seems to be popular. In other words, we can hope for a Conservative government under Brian Mulroney for whom conservatism is a way of life and not just a suit one wears to Winston's in Toronto.

There is nothing wrong with having a bill of this type; the basic principles it addresses are laudable, as far as it has gone. There is no doubt that we must make working conditions as good as possible. The health and safety of Canadians at work is not something to be treated lightly.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation has, through the University College of Cape Breton, been working constantly on the aspects of health and safety for a considerable period of time. Although that crown corporation has had some problems and mishaps, I believe the people involved are sincerely trying to do a better job. I believe that the Occupational Health and Safety Branch of the University College of Cape Breton is doing an extremely good job.

However, I would be happier to see as much concern expressed and energy expended to find out how labour might better co-operate with management and entrepreneurs to raise our industrial output to a more reasonable level from its dismal 70 per cent capacity. I blame both the unions and the corporations for this state of affairs. I believe that if there were more management committees and more co-operation between the companies and the unions, we would achieve a higher level of production.

Certainly we must all look out for our rights and privileges, but we must also cultivate a sense of responsibility. There is no more room in our industrial relations for the traditional adversarial positions of labour and management. I lived and worked in a place and at a time when you had to tie up a coal mine so that steps would be taken to ventilate the mine properly. I think we have come quite a distance since then. I believe there should be more co-operation between both sides and a continuing system of labour-management committees. I am sure our younger senators, such as Senator Sinclair, must remember the times during the last war when we had labour-management committees that worked very well together in many industries and ironed out many of the problems which would have grown to a greater magnitude had they not been discussed by these committees. I am not suggesting that this would take rights away from labour unions; it is not a wedge between unions and management. Something that has the potential of growing into a larger problem perhaps could be ironed out with regular meetings every week, ten days, or so. We have to learn to work together, or we may have to learn to starve together if our production keeps going down.

The importance of the legislation before us is not just in the fact that it will directly affect that 10 per cent of the Canadian labour force which it covers; it is also vital because it has the potential of a demonstration effect for the rest of the workers across the country. By showing what can be done in these areas of federal jurisdiction to improve the situations in which people work, it will set an example for industry and for the provinces.

In particular, honourable senators, this bill has demonstrated an impressive sensitivity to the importance of the family unit. Currently, 17 weeks of unpaid maternity leave are available to a female employee after she has been in a job for one year. The required working time is now reduced to six months, which is an improvement. An additional 24 weeks of unpaid child-care leave is offered to natural and adoptive parents.

Honourable senators, I can only react sympathetically to such proposals. When I think of the number of abortions that are carried out every year and of the marriages which break up and of the number of children who end up in trouble because of parental neglect, surely there can be nothing wrong with making it easier for young people who want to do so to be with their babies. The hope is that this closeness, once established, will last a lifetime and that the children will feel better about seeking guidance later on and about discussing problems with their parents. The amendments along these lines are bright, good and worthwhile. The opposition in the other place had to intervene to make the qualifying period a little more reasonable, but that is why the opposition is there. Much as the government hates to accept its suggestions, on quite a number of occasions it is extremely valuable.

In the case of this bill, for example, the opposition intervened further to strengthen the provision that protects workers from sexual harassment. We clarified the definition of sexual harassment as being any conduct, comment, gesture or contact of a sexual nature that might, on reasonable grounds, be perceived by an employee as placing a condition of a sexual nature on employment or on any opportunity for training or promotion. Before this clarification, the perception of sexual harassment could have been made by any employee, including those not involved. The clarification leaves the perception of sexual harassment to the employee involved. I think that is an appropriate amendment.

As I mentioned previously, through the amendments the opposition party also strengthened the bill's clauses on occupational hazards and safety. I made mention of DEVCO, and I commend them for their progress in that regard. Dr. Albert Prossin, the director, is involved with that movement at the University College of Cape Breton. They are doing an extremely good job on occupational hazards and safety.

The opposition was concerned about the accident rate in Canada. The accident rate causes more work stoppages in Canada than all the strikes put together, and that is serious. There is a need for greater concern about health and safety in the work place. We did not feel that this bill was going anywhere near far enough in terms of measures of health and safety.

Senator Marsden has spoken about co-operation. I note that on page 5194 of the House of Commons Hansard, the Honourable Bryce Mackasey, former Minister of Labour, said that he thinks the Conservative Party has been more than co-operative in the passage of this bill. I thought I would put that on the record.

To the clause which described the obligation of the employee to report to the employer any thing or circumstance in a work place that is likely to be hazardous to the safety or health of the employee or any of his fellow employees, the phrase was added "or other persons granted access to the work place by the employer." In other words, the opposition took what I feel is quite a progressive step. Through this addition, we said that we are not only concerned about the health and safety of an employee or an employer—which is quite right and we should be—but we are also concerned about the health and safety of other people granted access to that work place. We are concerned with public safety and believe that it is as important as the safety of the individual employer and employee. Our amendment was accepted by the government and now forms part of the bill that is before honourable senators today.

[Senator Muir.]

Not all of the amendments proposed by the opposition were accepted, however. The government failed to accept the greater protection for workers which was contained in other amendments proposed by our party. We wanted to define clearly what actions an employer could take to punish those guilty of sexual harassment. We suggested that the employer be empowered to take disciplinary measures as outlined in the policy or as provided in the collective agreements. Instead, the government stuck with its own vague wording to the effect that the employer will take such disciplinary measures as he or she deems appropriate. The opposition was also concerned about the potential hazard to workers resulting from exposure to video display terminals. We expressed that concern by moving an amendment. Unfortunately, the government decided to turn that down as well.

The opposition's amendment on technological change was accepted, and that is gratifying. The amendment provides that an employer who is introducing new technology will be expected to share with the employees affected the reasons for the change.

Our party recently conducted a study—for which Senator Nurgitz was partly responsible—on the issue of technological displacement and manpower training and retraining. We discovered that Canada was backward when it came to its willingness to adopt the new technologies that would make us competitive in the world market. I feel that our failure to adopt new technologies is one of the primary reasons why our economy is in trouble, why our dollar has dropped so dramatically, why our interest rates are so high and why we have 2 million unemployed people. Should someone wish to correct me by saying that that figure is somewhat lower—that it is 1.4 million or some such figure—I will merely say that that figure represents those people who are registered as being unemployed. It would not include the other half million or so who are tired, disgusted or fed up with registering and being unable to find jobs.

The reluctance to accept new technology is one of the reasons why Canada's standard of living has fallen from the second highest to the thirteenth highest in the world. We do not have the attitudes, the systems, the tax policies or the people necessary to take this country into the twenty first century. Honourable senators, we are facing a crisis in this regard.

Another opposition amendment that was accepted by the government and which makes me feel particularly good is the "conscience clause," which was mentioned by Senator Marsden. This provision was suggested by the Seventh Day Adventists and other religious groups who share the same feeling. I will go further into that a little later.

Honourable senators, some people are not enamoured of the idea of compulsory membership in a union. That is a closed shop. Either a person joins a union or he does not work. I believe in the Rand formula. Unlike some of my colleagues on this side of the chamber, on that side or in the other place, I believe in it. I am firmly convinced that it should be in place. However, with the new regulation—the conscience clause—those who are of a firm religious conviction can opt out of union membership. Their money, however—the equivalent of the union dues—must go to a charity or something of that nature, as was mentioned by Senator Marsden.

I might add, honourable senators, that we in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, have long since instituted the Rand formula. We in Nova Scotia have had many unions—the old PWA or Provincial Workmen's Association, the United Mine Workers, and so on—because we were forced to have them. We had management who came in to operate the steel mills and the coal mines in such a way that you either did what they told you to do or you did not have a job. You had to work for what they felt like giving you. Then, when things got bad, they either came over here with their bucks and took over what they could get hold of or took off and went back to jolly old England, or somewhere like that. That is why we in Nova Scotia had to have unions. We had to have strong unions, and I believe in them. I believe that we must have them. Some will say that they go too far, but where would we be without them?

To return to the conscience clause, the government has accepted this amendment which allows for an exception to the rule for union membership and the paying of dues on the grounds of religious belief or conviction. If it is against your religious principles to join a union, you will not have to, nor will you have to pay dues to a union. You can direct the employer to take the money that he deducts from your wages for union dues and give it to a registered charity of your choice. That applies only to legitimate cases; it does not apply to someone who is a phony, who is not religious but says, "I am very religious". I would not buy that one.

An Hon. Senator: Where would he give the money?

Senator Muir: Perhaps to an atheistic-Christian society! It is good for us to laugh about a few of these things now, but it was because people had to crawl around in filthy, mucky, dirty coal mines, or in steel mills, for a few bucks a day, and because their bosses would not listen to anyone, that it became necessary to have unions; and that is why I believe in them. I believe we must have unions. I suppose there are some people who would not like my saying that. I have organized unions and have participated fully in them. I have been deeply involved with unions. They are not always right. Sometimes they are wrong. Many times they make mistakes, just as members of the other place and honourable senators make mistakes.

Senator Flynn: Even the government.

Senator Muir: Even the government. People in church organizations, fraternal organizations, in service clubs, and in every facet of society make mistakes. So everything is not all well and good with unions; but neither is it all well and good with management. So please do not get the wrong idea, the idea that I am trying to put forward the philosophy that whatever a union says is right. That is not always true. But neither is management always right. So come let us reason together. Sometimes as a last resort we have to do that. A number of times I proposed having labour courts—I believe they work in some countries—so that we might not have so many strikes and the resultant loss of production. But nothing came of my proposal.

Someone may ask, "Why did you stop with the religious groups?"—as I believe Senator Haidasz intimated. "What about atheists, and so on?" Others will wonder, "Why did you stop at that?" There are still others who would consider compulsory membership in a union and the paying of union dues a horrendous encroachment on their personal freedom. Such people had better reconsider and find out where they would be without unions, associations and organizations. Others might ask why they should be subjected to what they consider to be an outrage. They would object on the ground that no one should be forced into belonging to any group in society. I do not go along with that. I am expressing my own views, but probably my party would agree with me.

Unions, in response to such objections, defend their position by saying that everyone must contribute, as the unions represent all of the workers and the benefits obtained accrue to everyone. That is right. Why should unions work to provide benefits for the work force and then have someone come along suggesting, "I am not going to pay union dues, but I am going to get those extra bucks that the union fought for." People should pay union dues, unless they legitimately come under the provision of this new clause.

I am pleased to see the amendment that protects religious freedom. Under our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, there is something of value in that. Some people may ask, "Are you not disappointed? After all, not much concern is paid to deeply held convictions on freedom in general." Well, there comes a time when you simply have to take a stand and stop destroying the bargaining units or the unions.

This bill, as amended by the Progressive Conservative Party in the other place, is much better than when it was first introduced. I believe we could make it even better, but it should be obvious to everyone here that we are not going to be given the time to do so. In both the Liberal and Progressive Conservative Parties in the other place and here there are former fishermen, iron ore workers, coal miners, union leaders, and people representing many and varied occupations. They exist in both parties. But for 27 years I listened in the other place—not here, thank God—to those who said that the only people who were concerned about the oppressed, the downtrodden, the widows, the orphans, the old age pensioners, and everyone who suffered, were the socialists, the members of the New Democratic Party. Just how phony can you get? I had to fight that one in the unions. They said, "How can you be a Progressive Conservative and president of a union and be on the mine committee? You should be CCF," as it was then.

My point is that we are all human beings no matter what party we belong to. The socialists can't wrap themselves in robes of sanctity and purity, claiming, "We are the only ones who cry for the poor and the oppressed". No way will I accept that. They can cry all they want. They may suggest that they are saints and all that sort of thing—to the point that one might almost think that no one else but the socialist party ever raised questions of old age pensions, of increased wages or of welfare—but that is not correct.

I have no doubt that the government would like to rush this bill through. Personally, I would not want to have it passed in such a hurry, but the government will want to get out on the hustings under the leadership of their silver-haired John, and at Winston's they will say, "Look at the wonderful legislation we have passed. Look at what we have done for labour". I always thought that Winston was a brand of American cigarettes. I would never be rich enough to get into a place like Winston's, wherever it is. They tell me it is somewhere in Toronto. Perhaps I could buy a glass of water there. But I don't think I would ever get in there. I would never be invited.

Senator Flynn: Are you going, Senator Frith?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No.

Senator Muir: Perhaps if I mentioned Senator Frith's name, I might get in. The government members may brag about the legislation and say that it is fantastic, that it is better than we had, but I believe it is too little, too late.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: It is half a loaf.

Senator Muir: I believe that the rank and file of the labour force have had it with this government because of its activities and its inactivity.

I now come to a nice point in my few remarks. Before concluding, I want to say a word or two about the former Minister of Labour, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen. It was announced yesterday that he will not be running again.

• (1600)

Senator Flynn: Crawl.

Senator Muir: I love this side play but it is not as entertaining as the Johnny Carson Show or Bob Hope.

The Honourable Allan J. MacEachen has served in many portfolios, including that of Minister of Labour. He has done many things in government for the working people. Despite that fact, I tried many times to knock him off in elections but, regrettably, I was never successful. Of course, he tried to do the same to me. However, I think he deserves a word of commendation.

Hon. C. William Doody: That's it, just a word.

Senator Muir: I hope that his multi-faceted qualities will not be lost to Cape Breton, Nova Scotia or to Canada because of the changes that are taking place in the other place and within the Liberal Party. With those few kind remarks—of course, all my remarks are kindly—I thank all of you for your kind attention and Senator Marsden for her kindness in explaining the bill to us in a really good way. However, I think that since this bill went through committee in the other place—and one morning they sat until 2 o'clock—I do not feel that we should send it to committee here, but when we come back in the fall we should re-open the whole thing and go to work on it.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators—

[Senator Muir.]

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to advise honourable senators that if Senator Marsden speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Muir for his very kind words on my earlier comments and also to say that I appreciated, as I am sure we all did, his very kind words about the Honourable Allan MacEachen who, I am sure, we will all miss and from whom we all learned a great deal. I should like to thank you for your support for the progressive aspects of this bill. The bill clearly is the product of discussions by both our parties and the third party in the house at an earlier stage, and it is gratifying to have that work supported here. Your view of the importance of unions and collective bargaining in the development of the protection of workers in this country is a view I share.

However, there is a very important role for legislation. I remind senators that on December 19, 1883, the Knights of Labour at their annual congress in Toronto called for a nine hour day and equal wages for women. We have had the nine hour day, the eight hour day and shorter hour days for a very long time, but last December was the 100th anniversary of the call for equal pay for women and still our earnings average only 60 per cent of the wages of men. Unions have not yet fought that battle successfully. I think they need our help and I hope that Senator Muir will join this side of the house in bringing about that legislation under a new government.

Senator Flynn: You may have to do that with us.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Wishful thinking!

Senator Marsden: I am sure that your complaint about the timing of the bill is appreciated but it has been subject to extensive consultation. Nonetheless, in the same spirit in which the government by this bill has improved the Canada Labour Code through these amendments, I am confident that the new Liberal government will respond again to the need to amend the code, including consideration of the amendments which you would like to have put forward here.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: What a hope!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John B. Stewart moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to establish the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-32 is to establish the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. Clause 4 of the bill outlines the specific purposes of the institute. It reads:

The purpose of the Institute is to increase knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to international peace and security from a Canadian perspective, with particular emphasis on arms control, disarmament, defence and conflict resolution, and to

- (a) foster, fund and conduct research on matters relating to international peace and security;
- (b) promote scholarship in matters relating to international peace and security;
- (c) study and propose ideas and policies for the enhancement of international peace and security;
- (d) collect and disseminate information on, and encourage public discussion of, issues of international peace and security.

Those will be the specific purposes of this institute if it is established.

In its composition, the institute is somewhat like the International Development Research Centre. The institute would be composed of up to 17 directors, of whom two would occupy additional offices. One of these would be the chairman and the other would be the executive director of the institute. I want to point out to honourable senators that not all the other directors need be Canadian. Up to seven of the directors may be from countries other than Canada. This approach follows the model of the International Development Research Centre, of which I had the honour, before I achieved the greater honour of coming here, to be a governor. I was very much impressed by the contribution made by people from other countries to the deliberations of that board. They kept us from getting too much caught up in adulation of things Canadian; and they brought viewpoints which were refreshing and enlightening. I think the authors of this bill are to be commended for following that model to some extent.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to delay the house long in sermonizing about the importance of peace—we are all converts. The bill before us comes to us as a government measure. However, peace and its promotion are matters in which all Canadians, regardless of political party, are keenly interested. Peace and the promotion of peace are matters to which all Canadians are strongly dedicated. I suppose any disagreement in this respect concerns the means, the modalities of achieving the agreed end.

The bill before us was improved greatly by members of all parties in the other place. Speaking earlier on a prior order, Senator Muir referred to the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen. Until recently he was my member of Parliament.

An Hon. Senator: He still is.

Senator Stewart: Since he does not plan to run for re-election, I will not deliver a homily in his honour. However, in the other place he had this to say:

There have been few other pieces of legislation about which consultation between the government and the opposition parties has been so close and so co-operative.

He then goes on to mention some of the ways in which that consultation took place.

The result of all this is that the bill, and the plans which are penumbral to it are really not so much a matter for one political party or another; they are a matter for Parliament. The most specific evidence that this is true is contained in the list of names of those who will be put forward as directors if the bill passes. I feel I ought to go down the list because some of the names will be interesting to honourable senators. More important than that, the list gives some sense of the type of institution this will be. These names give us some sense of the scope and amplitude of the activities to which the institution will be addressing itself. The names are: Norman Alcock, President, World Federalists of Canada; William Barton, former Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations; George Bell, Director, Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies and former General, Canadian Armed Forces; Christoph Bertram, Editor of Die Zeit, former Director of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, London; Harriet Critchley, Director, the Arctic Institute of North America, University of Calgary; Paul Desmarais, Chairman, Power Corporation; Gwynne Dyer, international affairs journalist and military historian; William Epstein, former Director of the UN Disarmament Division; Margaret Fulton, President of Mount St. Vincent University, Halifax; Albert Legault, Professor of Political Science, Laval University; Joanna Miller, Project Ploughshares, Saskatchewan, and former President of UNICEF Canada; Denis McDermott, President, Canadian Labour Congress; John Sigler, Professor of Political Science, Carleton University; Ian Smart, former Director of Studies, Royal Institute of International Affairs, London; Paul Warnke, former Director, U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency; Lois Wilson, former Moderator of the United Church of Canada; and Gerald Wright, Vice-President, Canadian Donner Foundation.

These persons have not yet been appointed. Obviously, they cannot be appointed until the bill passes Parliament. However, this is the list of people who have been agreed between and among the several parties on the Canadian federal political scene. In a sense, that is the tangible evidence that this institute is not being set up by any one party, but, rather, is being thought of as a Canadian effort for the promotion of world peace.

I must confess that once upon a time I was enrolled in a school of international affairs. This has caused me to think from time to time about matters of peace and war. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to unburden myself of two or three reflections which have grown upon me over the years as I have meditated upon peace and war. I use the term "war and peace", "peace and war", with a kind of private story in mind, a story which I will share with this chamber.

When General Eisenhower became President of Columbia University he was eager that the university should establish an institute of war. Coming out of the experience of World War II, he thought this was a matter which was not being sufficiently examined in the United States of America. Of course, some of the professors at the university immediately got into a great flap. They thought that here was a militarist coming in who was going to turn the university into a sort of military academy. What happened in that academic setting is something that politicians will understand perfectly well. The university set up an institute and they called it "The Institute of War and Peace Studies." The General was happy, as were the doves. I find it difficult to talk about peace and war, or war and peace, without remembering the late General Eisenhower in that connection.

Let me say a word about the matter of maintaining peace. We hear so much about maintaining peace. There is such a proliferation of peace promoting activities that we begin to get bored. We hear about studies on peace; learned journals come on to one's desk on the subject of peace. Conferences are held with respect to the subject; I daresay that dozens of them are being held this month around the world. Institutes are being set up to deal with the subject of peace. Consequently, one might be tempted to say, "Not another institute for the promotion of international peace and security!" There is a kind of weariness, a kind of cynicism that over the years tends to set in. We come to think that we have heard it all before. That kind of cynicism, that kind of weariness ought to be resisted. I believe that to allow that kind of cynicism and weariness to overwhelm us would be to concede the battle, to give up the cause and to accept the end of our civilization. We simply must refresh ourselves, fight back against the fog of weariness, the fog of cynicism. At the same time, of course, we must take what is valid from that weariness and cynicism; and that is that a lot of frothy nonsense is frequently written and talked about war and peace, about peace and security. However, that does not mean that the whole effort should be abandoned. We must maintain a good balance.

Then there is another point. We sometimes think that there is a peace industry, that people will say, "They have good jobs; they are in the peace industry and that, of course, is an industry for which the market will never be saturated. There will always be an adequate market for more and more peace." Honourable senators, there is a point there, but only one point. We could also say that there is a health industry, and consequently close down the hospitals and fire all the doctors. We could say—heaven forbid—that there is an education industry and close down all the universities—remembering, of course, that there are only so many places in the Senate of Canada. What would happen to the poor professors in that case? What would happen to the students? Simply because some of these activities take on an aspect of employment and industry does not mean that these activities are not inherently valuable and worthwhile. I think we have to resist the industrialization of good works, but we must also resist the abandonment of good works simply out of fear of "industrialization."

[Senator Stewart.]

On another point: It is very easy, when a politician proposes something highly desirable, to dismiss it as arising simply from political motivation. We know that some people in the media are inclined to dismiss all our efforts, whether we are provincial premiers or federal politicians, particularly if they entail good works, as being the product of mere political motivation. If politicians were scared off by that kind of comment and reaction, then we would do precisely nothing. In my opinion, we ought not to allow those who observe the political process to inhibit premiers, members of the House of Commons or senators from undertaking or advancing good causes merely because they happen to be politicians.

I should like to conclude, honourable senators, by suggesting to you that there is a good reason why we hear about more and more studies, conferences and institutes relating to peace. Very often, academics talk about "the problem of peace." I submit that that is a very misleading way of writing or speaking, because when you use that word "problem", you imply that there is a solution, that somehow or other you can crack the problem of peace, that you can then install the solution so that the world will be happy ever afterwards. A good conservative political philosopher once said that politics should never be thought of in terms of problems; he said that politics is rather like commanding a ship on the high seas. You deal with one wave and then you deal with another wave in the endless journey through time. I think that that is a much more realistic and valid approach than the so-called "problem" approach.

The "problem" approach is a misleading paradigm. It promotes undue optimism and, consequently, it promotes depression and desolation. Peace is something like liberty. The old adage says that liberty is maintained by eternal vigilance. Well, peace is maintained by eternal striving. We make peace and remake it, day after day, year after year. We must go back and track over the same ground, do many of the same things again, to educate ourselves and to educate the new generations as they come along. The mere fact that there is need for so much repetition should not cause us to think that nothing is being accomplished. Every day that peace is maintained, an accomplishment has been made; and, as circumstances change, new approaches must be adopted.

This bill proposes a Canadian Institute of International Peace and Security. This is a new approach. The institute is not designed to parallel or replicate the Department of External Affairs or the Department of National Defence. It is not designed to have the specific academic orientation of university departments of political science or of schools of strategic studies and the like. It is designed with a much wider scope than that. There is also the possibility that it will be consulted by the Government of Canada, and even, with the approval of the House of Commons, by the appropriate committee of the House of Commons. It will be a unique institution. No one can guarantee how much it will contribute, but I suggest to you that as long as we retain our hope for the future we must be bold enough to make bold departures such as this. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I tell the Honourable Senator Stewart that I have listened with very close attention to his refreshing, challenging and persuasive words on the introduction of this piece of legislation. There is a question that he poses, at least by implication, to which we all must make a response, and that is: "What can we do for peace?" In this bill, he has offered some suggestions as to how some contribution may be made to that cause.

I must admit that when the first draft of the bill appeared I found myself in some difficulty with it because it was squarely in line with the usual government response to a difficult problem: That is to erect an institution, create a body or form a commission to tackle something that they are not very sure they can do something about themselves. In fact, in the realm of peace, we have had previous initiatives that have been in this general line. In the Throne Speech in 1978 there was a proposal that there should be an ambassador for disarmament. Nothing was done immediately, but in 1979 a consultative group was set up to deal with that subject. I have to confess I do not know what they ever did. I know that there have been minutes published which I have not had an opportunity to read, but apparently they did not make a good enough impression to have that register with some of us.

Then there was an ambassador for disarmament actually appointed in 1980. He held office for a couple of years and was replaced by another man who has since gone into another field leaving no ambassador for disarmament since the beginning of this year. So, when I first read this bill I thought it was another one of those—one hesitates to say "token" because they are more than that—moves that are not as effective as one would have wished in dealing with a problem of this kind.

The purpose of this bill is to provide and disseminate information on this topic, as stated in clause 4 of the bill. That clause was read by Senator Stewart and I interpret that to mean basically the collection of knowledge and the dissemination of knowledge on this problem.

When I first read the original version of the bill to see how this body was to be constituted, I saw that the entire authority was to be placed in the hands of the Governor in Council, with no guidelines setting out who should be asked to take part in the process, and I must confess that I had a certain skepticism. However, on reading the amended bill, which clearly shows the involvement of all parties in the House of Commons—although unfortunately we do not seem to be included in the magic circle of those to be consulted—and sets out the organization and structure by which this task is to be performed, which was modified to include input from the opposition parties and a provision to consult with the Leader of the Opposition, whether he has blue eyes or a big chin, that made me feel a great deal better because it seemed to me that the concept that I originally observed—that is, that it would be another government board—is now no longer correct. I am now disabused of that notion. It now appears to be much more an institution under the control and aegis of Parliament rather than of the executive.

That, I think, is a very good thing. I know that had the original version of the bill been presented to us today instead of this much-amended copy I would have had some harsh words to say respecting that way of proceeding in this important matter. So, I am glad to acknowledge that the amendments that have been made to this bill constitute, in my mind, a splendid improvement.

When one sees the list of names of those suggested as being members of this institute, one's sense of confidence is reinforced, because that is a list of worthy people, indeed, who will, if anyone can, make something out of this project.

I notice that there is a considerable amount of money to be made available. I am not sure I am right in offering this suggestion, but I will offer it in any event; I do hope there will not be an effort on the part of this government and this institution to duplicate a good deal of the work that is being done by other institutions. The world is not short, as Senator Stewart indicated, of organizations studying peace. There is the Institute of Strategic Studies located in London and the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, two organizations of international repute. There are similar bodies in many other western countries. We have at least five Canadian universities studying that kind of thing. There is another body studying this subject, the report of which just came into my hands today, the Canadian Centre for Arms Control and Disarmament.

I hope that when this institute sets about its work it will consider the advisability of ensuring that institutions which are in that field, if it can be said that they are doing valuable work, will consider making grants to them out of the funds available to it, as it is entitled to do under the statute, rather than attempt to duplicate that work.

That brings me to a central problem. I wish I had an answer to it, but perhaps when Senator Stewart replies he can offer me some suggestions.

The purpose of the institute, as set out in clause 4, is to:

- (a) foster, fund and conduct research on matters relating to international peace and security;
- (b) promote scholarship in matters relating to international peace and security;
- (c) study and propose ideas and policies for the enhancement of international peace and security;
- (d) collect and disseminate information on, and encourage public discussion of, issues of international peace and security.

That is good, one cannot object to that, but where is the link between this activity and action? Where is the link between this dissemination of information or this collection of ideas, all of which are valuable and which I, by no means, downgrade? Where is the connection between that and getting something done?

Well, you may say that Prime Minister Trudeau tried, and he made a good try. I think we are grateful that he did make a good try, but it is obvious to me that for all his effort one has to think that the impetus is diminishing—it has not petered out entirely, and I am a little surprised at that—because of the problems he encountered in making the move from ideas to action. I suppose you might say that the Canadian Parliament might be challenged to lend a hand; I suppose you might say that committees of this chamber or of the other place might be challenged to do what they can to devise means of securing some greater attention on the part of others to this worldwide problem. I do not know. I am puzzled by that. One does not have to convince anyone in this nation about peace; one does not have to convince anyone in this nation about disarmament—or very few; one does not have to convince anyone in this nation about the absolute horror of a nuclear conflict. The question is: What can we do about it?

My fear is that bodies of this sort, with the best intentions in the world, will have the same problem we have in this house in making the jump from knowledge, information and desire to action. I wish I could offer a solution to that difficult question. But then, perhaps, that question ought to be put to this institute as its first item, and perhaps the members of that institute, as representatives of the citizens of this country, can help us and help the people generally by proposing ways and means by which we can promote the cause of peace, not just in the realm of the intellect, but in the realm of action and effectiveness. If that can be done, I think we would all be eternally grateful to them.

So, I approach this bill with a revised frame of mind. When I first saw the legislation I was fairly hostile, but having seen the way it was amended to make it more non-partisan and acceptable in its structure, and when I see the names of the people who have been agreed upon as being the first members of the board, and as I listened to Senator Stewart's presentation earlier today, I must say that I feel better and have no objection to the passage of this legislation.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Stewart speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading on this bill.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, if what I said originally is read together with the valuable comments made by Senator Roblin, everything that needs to be said is on the record.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[Senator Roblin.]

Motion agreed to.

YORK UNIVERSITY

ESTABLISHMENT OF MURRAY ANTHONY ELIA CHAIR

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 5, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the establishment of the Murray Anthony Elia Chair in Canadian Italian Studies at York University.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the Senate that a Chair in Canadian Italian Studies was established at York University, on May 14, 1984. That Chair is known as the Murray Anthony Elia Chair. First, I should like to express my thanks to the people and institutions that made it possible to achieve this objective. Mr. Elia contributed $350,000 without which funds we would not have been able to proceed with this project. I hope that the Italian community at a future date will express its thanks and gratitude to Mr. Elia in a more appropriate way.

I should also like to thank the Prime Minister of Canada and the Liberal government for establishing a policy of multiculturalism by which, through its program, namely, the Endowment Assistance Fund, it was possible for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the Honourable David Michael Collette, to match the amount which was raised privately.

In addition, I should like to thank York University for hosting the Chair. York University is situated in the northwest corner of Toronto in the heart of the Italian community. The $700,000 fund will provide a permanent mechanism for the continuing studies of and research into the contribution Italians have made to the history and development of this country.

The question might arise as to why it was necessary to establish such a Chair. In my conversations with honourable senators, with people of Italian origin and Canadians in general, I realized that there is much ignorance on some of the historical facts about Canada. I think that this Chair will highlight research done on this subject and make it available to the public in general.

It must be remembered that in the fifteenth century, Italy was divided into several principalities. These principalities were often at war with one another. The leaders of the losing side often had to take refuge in another country. Some of the people who were on the losing side took refuge in France because France had a similar climate to Italy, the language was also similar and psychologically that country was very receptive to Italians because two Italian queens of the de Medici family, Catherine and Maria de Medici, married French kings and, consequently, Italians were welcome. The French were very clever people. They used these talented individuals in their colonies. Others, though, went to different countries, but not all of the expatriates were refugees; some left voluntarily in search of sponsors for their objectives. Others just happened to be there. For instance, Christopher Columbus, or "Cristofolo Colombo", a Genoese, was in the service of King Ferdinand of Spain. He crossed the Atlantic in 1492 in search of the coast of Asia and landed in San Salvador. He claimed the land in King Ferdinand's name. Five years later, Giovanni Caboto, a Venetian in the service of King Henry VII, who is known in English Canadian history books as John Cabot and in French history books as Jean Cabot, crossed the Atlantic, following a much more northerly route and landed in what is now Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, although this is a point of contention with the people of Newfoundland. I am not going to dispute this difference of opinion between the two provinces.

At the same period of time another Italian navigator from Florence, Amerigo Vespucci, was in the service of Ferdinand of Spain. It is alleged that he crossed the Atlantic on the same route as Christopher Columbus, in 1497, but sailed beyond San Salvador into Central America and then veered left probably to Brazil. This voyage is disputed, but we are not going to try to delve into the accuracy of this voyage. Upon returning to Spain he wrote a letter to the de Medici family in Florence. In his letter he made reference to the new land or Mundus Novus. The letter was supposed to be a private one, but for some reason copies were made and they were circulated throughout Europe. One copy ended up in the hands of an Austrian cartographer, Martin Waldseemüller, who was in the process of drawing a new map of the New World. Mr. Waldseemüller, although he was aware of Christopher Columbus' voyage, because he liked the name "America", decided to name the southern part of the continent America.

Apparently, this map subsequently ended up in the hands of a famous Flemish cosmographer and cartographer by the name of Gerardus Mercator. Mercator was also drawing a map of the New World and on it he wrote "AME" on the northern part of the continent and "RICA" across the southern part, thus establishing forever the name of America in the New World. This information is contained in a book entitled The Children of Columbus, written by Erik Amfitheatrof. Again, I am not going to challenge the information contained in this book, and I am only sharing that information with honourable senators.

● (1650)

The true discoverer of America was a man of whom very little is known; his name was Giovanni da Verrazzano. There is a bridge named after him in Manhattan. He was one of the four great Italian navigators and explorers.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Everyone came from Italy.

Senator Bosa: At one time or another I suppose they must have all gone through there.

Senator Frith: The Garden of Eden was not in Italy.

Senator Bosa: Giovanni da Verrazzano crossed the Atlantic in 1524 following a route half way between that of Columbus and that of Giovanni Caboto. This was ten years before Jacques Cartier's first voyage.

Senator Flynn: What was the second name?

Senator Bosa: Giovanni Caboto.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: What happened to John Cabot?

Senator Bosa: Giovanni da Verrazzano was in the service of the King of France, Francis I. He landed in what is now North Carolina and sailed south to Florida. He then proceeded all the way north to Nova Scotia proving for the first time that Canada was linked to the rest of the North American continent.

While sailing, he made frequent landings and took account of the life of the natives, of the vegetation and of the soil conditions. He went back to France and convinced the French court that it was possible to colonize the new land and that further exploration was desirable.

He also drew a map of the land that he had explored and he wrote on it "Francesca" in honour of Francis I. That name appeared on two or three maps and later it disappeared because, by that time, the maps of Waldseemüller and Mercator had already been circulated in Europe and, consequently, it was an accepted fact that it was named "America". I suppose that, if da Verrazzano's name of the new land, "Francesca," had remained, we, today, perhaps would be known as "Francescans."

Da Verrazzano knew that the place at which he had landed was a new body of land that lay between Europe and Asia. Unlike Christopher Columbus and Giovanni Caboto, he was convinced that this was the new world. Amerigo Vespucci at first thought he had landed on a new world but then reversed himself and was of the opinion that it was the coast of Asia.

When we examine the history of Canada we find that Italians have played a significant role throughout its history. In 1642 Father Bressani, a Jesuit, established a Catholic mission in Huronia, Ontario. The first regiment that came to New France to defend the settlers from native attacks, the Carignan Regiment, contained many Italian soldiers and officers. One such officer was named Carlo Marini. The Marini family was of noble Genoese origin. Captain Marini came to this country in 1664 and served in New France all his life. His son Paul became a high-ranking officer in the army and served in the Ohio region. The grandson, Giuseppe Marini, an officer, was wounded at the Battle of the Plains of Abraham in 1759.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): On which side?

Senator Bosa: On the French side, but Italians did not confine themselves to helping only the French, which I will explain in a moment.

In 1678, Enrico Tonti came to Canada. He was the assistant to de la Salle. While de la Salle went back and forth to raise funds to finance the explorations, it was Enrico Tonti who actually did the exploring. He built ships to cross the lakes and built forts to fend off the attacks by unfriendly natives. It was he who learned the languages of the natives. He established channels of communication with the Indians. He spent 25 years exploring the North American continent. He had an intimate knowledge of the continent from Hudson Bay to the Mississippi River and to the Gulf of Florida.

In 1703 Captain Tommaso Crisafi was appointed Governor of Trois Rivières.

Senator Flynn: Who?

Senator Bosa: Captain Crisafi was one of two brothers who served in New France in the French army. He was appointed Governor of Trois Rivières.

Senator Flynn: In what year?

Senator Bosa: In 1703.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes.

Senator Frith: You remember?

Senator Flynn: One was my ancestor, but not a Flynn.

Senator Bosa: In 1759 at the Battle of the Plains of Abraham, third in command was Carlo Burlamacchi, known in French Canadian books as Bourlamaque. Brigadier General Carlo Burlamacchi played a key role in the Seven Years War that preceded the Battle of the Plains of Abraham. He laid siège to the City of Quebec in the winter of 1760 and defeated the British at the Battle of St. Foy. When in the spring the British navy appeared in the harbour, which event sealed the fate of New France, all these high-ranking officers were permitted to go back to France. Burlamacchi wrote the history of the battle of the Plains of Abraham, which is now in the archives of Paris.

In 1812, two regiments came here—the de Meuron and the de Watteville—to fight against the Americans on the side of the British. There were somewhat in excess of 300 Italian soldiers in the de Meuron Regiment. The de Watteville Regiment also contained a large number of Italians, although it is not known how many.

At the end of the war in 1816, these regiments were disbanded and most of the soldiers were given plots of land, as it was the usual practice of the British to give land to war veterans. They settled in the area of Drummondville which was the area the Americans would have attacked if they were to attack again.

During the Upper Canada Rebellion in 1837, Captain de Grassi of Toronto and his two daughters, Charlotte and Cornelia, played a very important role by providing intelligence about the rebels who were assembled at Montgomery Inn.

Honourable senators, I will not go into the nitty-gritty of other particulars of the history of Italians in Canada because I think I have been able to put before the Senate a few historical facts which indicate that Canadians of Italian origin have deep roots in this country.

It is necessary and important for people to know this history because, if Italian people learn that their ancestors have made such a great contribution to the history and development of Canada, they will feel a greater sense of belonging. I also believe that the more we learn about each other's contributions to Canada, the more likely we will be to accept one another as equals and not as intruders.

[Senator Bosa.]

I hope that with the establishment of the University Chair in Canadian Italian studies, it will bring to the surface historical facts which are not too well known at this time.

I also hope that other minority groups will research their historical backgrounds in order that we may learn more about each other. I think this history should be taught in elementary schools where children may learn about their ancestors' contribution to Canada, thus building a more harmonious society in this country, a society that is already amongst the most tolerant and open in the world.

• (1700)

I thought that I would share with honourable senators some of these facts so that they would know the reason why we have established a chair of Canadian Italian studies at York University.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of June 27, 1984, moved:

That Rule 66(1)(b) be suspended in relation to the nomination of Senators to serve on the Special Committee of the Senate on Aboriginal Issues; and

That the following Senators be appointed to act on the said Special Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Adams, Bielish, Gigantès, Kirby, Marsden, Steuart and Watt.

He said: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this motion yesterday. It is a corollary to a motion that was passed earlier establishing this committee. There are two ways in which we normally name senators to committees. One is by using the Committee of Selection, and the other, which we occasionally use, is the practice of doing so directly by motion. That is the reason for this motion.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, June 29, 1984, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock we will give third reading to the bills that received second reading today. Information I have received from the other place indicates that we will have received Bill C-43, respecting the Canada-Nova Scotia Agreement on Offshore Oil and Gas Resource Management and Revenue Sharing. Because of extended hours this evening in the other place, we may also receive Bill C-30, to amend the Bank Act and Bill C-36, to amend the Interest Act. As I have mentioned, the amendments to the Bank Act simply deal with increasing the space for foreign banks, and those to the Interest Act form what is essentially a companion piece to Bill C-37, which dealt with mortgage protection. As I mentioned earlier today, there is the possibility that we will receive Bill C-24, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

We may receive several non-controversial bills. On the list I have been given are: Bill C-38, the Foreign Extraterritorial Measures Bill; Bill C-51, to implement a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland regarding reciprocal enforcement of judgments; a bill dealing with miscellaneous statutes for which I do not yet have a number; Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and another bill that does not yet have a number which deals with some amendments to the Saltfish Marketing Act. That list has been given to me as representing legislation we could receive, but there may be some shifting in it.

The plan would be to proceed with that legislation requiring third reading, after which we will deal with non-controversial legislation. The House of Commons will adjourn to wait for us to dispose of any legislation we are able to dispose of, after which it will join us for Royal Assent.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When will the house adjourn?

Senator Frith: It will adjourn when it has finished with the legislation it will pass.

Senator Roblin: There is no time set for the adjournment?

Senator Frith: No.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We have not heard anything about Bill C-252, which is a private bill that has just been passed by the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: I thank the honourable senator for that reminder. Bill C-252, to grant access to records of the Special Committee on the Defence of Canada Regulations, has been sponsored by Mr. John Reid and Mr. Blaine Thacker. For the benefit of honourable senators, I will read from the explanatory note:

During the Second World War a Special Committee on the Defence of Canada Regulations sat in camera and limited the distribution of its minutes and evidence to its members. The purpose of this Bill is to authorize the release of all the records of that Committee which are still classified.

I believe that the inspiration for the bill came about because of a wish to do some research on the whole question of civil liberties during wartime. The researchers found what I suppose is a bit of a treasure trove of material in the Minutes of that committee, and then found that there was no way in which the material could be released. That is the purpose for this bill.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Senate has received messages from the House of Commons concerning the passage of four bills which, I imagine, they hope we shall adopt today.

My first question is directed to the Deputy Leader of the Government: Does the House of Commons still intend to adjourn at five o'clock today? In the other place, they might get unanimous consent for sitting next week, considering the rate at which they have been working these last few days!

In the event of an adjournment at five o'clock this evening, can we expect to receive other bills which the Senate would be expected to adopt before five o'clock today?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, according to information I obtained this morning, the Commons plans to continue debate on a number of bills today. Although it is not quite the same list I gave you yesterday afternoon, the list I have here seems to be final. We do not have the assurance that all these bills will be passed in the other place, but I will name them, in any case. There is Bill C-50, which concerns the Department of Agriculture and relates to meat products; Bill C-47, concerning the rights of women and other aspects of the Indian Act; Bill C-56, a bill to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act; Bill C-51, a convention concerning a reciprocal agreement on enforcement of judgments with Great Britain and the United Kingdom; Bill C-54, a number of amendments concerning the Public Service and the Public Service pensions; Bill S-11, a Senate bill; Bill C-53, to establish the Mingan Archipelago National Park; and Bill C-36, to amend the Interest Act.

The other place will also be considering a general repeal bill. If I understand correctly, this is a formality, and concerns committee reports of the House of Commons and the Senate. There is another question concerning Bill C-52. My information is that the bill will be withdrawn to allow a committee of the other place to sit during the summer, to consider the subject matter of the bill.

There is a bill, as yet unnumbered, to amend the Saltfish Act. The purpose of the bill is to double or to increase the authorized amount of investment capital.

To get back to the adjournment question, according to my information the House of Commons is trying to complete consideration of these bills between noon and two o'clock, and will then adjourn at the sound of the bell and wait to see which bills we adopt. We could therefore have a Royal Assent by the end of the day.

Senator Flynn: Did I understand correctly that the House of Commons might adjourn around 1 p.m.?

Senator Frith: We hope so.

Senator Flynn: Does that mean we will not receive other bills after that, that any bill we expect will get here before 1 p.m. or 2 p.m.?

Senator Frith: That is the question I asked and the answer is yes. They hope, anyway.

Senator Flynn: If, perchance, we were exceptionally fast in working through the list of bills mentioned by the deputy leader, we would have 11 in addition to the four we received since yesterday. We would therefore have 15 bills—not bad for a day's work!

Senator Frith: There are other items, but as far as—

Senator Flynn: Have you found more?

Senator Frith: Oh no, those are all the bills. There are other items on the Order Paper.

Senator Flynn: The list you gave me adds up to 10 bills.

Senator Frith: I have nine.

Senator Flynn: You mentioned a bill concerning saltfish, but it has yet to be introduced in the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Flynn: I counted at least 10 bills in addition to those of yesterday; that makes 14 or 15 bills all told. At this stage of the game, we are not going to argue about one or two additional bills.

Senator Frith: I cannot understand how you arrive at a maximum of 15 bills. The bills are C-51, C-47, C-26—

Senator Flynn: C-50, C-37, C-26, C-51, C-54, S-11, C-53, C-36, C-52; there are two more which we have not received yet.

• (1010)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Not Bill C-52. That will not come before the Senate. They are referring that to a committee.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: As I said, it adds up to nine bills at most.

Senator Flynn: Plus the other four.

Senator Frith: The four bills we have.

Senator Flynn: Exactly.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EFFORTS TO REUNITE FAMILIES OF POLISH IMMIGRANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on June 26, 1984, concerning efforts of the government to reunite the families of the three Polish hunger strikers in Toronto. The answer is rather lengthy and I ask the permission of the Senate to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Deputy Prime Minister met yesterday with the Polish Ambassador. During their discussions, the Deputy Prime Minister put forward the Canadian government's clear concern about the three Polish hunger strikers in Toronto.

At the same time, Peter Hancock, the Director General of Canada's Eastern European Bureau met with the Polish Foreign Minister in Warsaw on Monday and made similar representations.

The Polish Government has been one of the most forthcoming in cases concerning family reunification and the Government feels that representations made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and senior departmental officials are the best means of bringing that about.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ST. JOHN'S—PORT AUX BASQUES RAILWAY FREIGHT LINE

Hon. H.A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on June 13, 1984, concerning the St. John's—Port aux Basques railway freight line. The answer is fairly lengthy. Therefore, may I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

In 1980/81 the federal government commenced a 5-year $67 million Testing and Evaluation program to revitalize the railway in Newfoundland and to determine its long-term role. The primary thrust of the program was the implementation of a container-based system. This is a process whereby the conventional railway cars are replaced by containers. The shipper on the mainland loads his commodity into a container that is taken by truck to a terminal where it is placed on a container flat car for delivery via rail to North Sydney. At North Sydney the container is placed on a rubber tired chassis for movement across the Gulf to Port aux Basques. At Port aux Basques the container is loaded again onto a railway container flat car whereby it is delivered by rail to one of the three terminals located at Corner Brook, Grand Falls and St. John's. At the terminal the container is loaded onto a rubber tired chassis for final destination delivery by truck. This use of containers allows CN to provide a competitive door-to-door service with a greatly improved level of service.

Early reports on the program are positive; shipper acceptance is high and the railway has regained previously lost traffic. An evaluation of the program is currently underway to serve as part of a review of the general transportation situation in Newfoundland in order that government can determine an appropriate role for the railway by March 31, 1985, the termination date of the Railway Testing and Evaluation program.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSION ACT—ADJUDICATION PROCESS

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall directed a question to me on June 20 with respect to the appointment of a review of the adjudication process under the Veterans Affairs Pension Program. At that time I said that I would take the question as notice.

I have been advised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that such a review will take place. It will not deal with the expansion of policy questions, but that it will be directed to administrative practices within that process.

NOVA SCOTIA

SYDNEY—PROPOSED CIVIC CENTRE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, a question was directed to me on June 25 by Senator Muir. He asked about the possible federal financial assistance for the construction of a civic centre to be located in Sydney, Nova Scotia. I made inquiries and while the matter has been drawn to the attention of the Secretary of State, no action has as yet taken place.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—VACANCIES

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, Senator Muir asked me a question on March 6, 1984, with respect to the Cape Breton Development Corporation. He requested information concerning the board of directors of that corporation.

I have been advised by the Honourable Ed Lumley, the minister responsible, that the board is composed of Steve Rankin, who is also president; Joseph Shannon, who is also chairman, and members Dr. John Burke and Donald MacInnis. There remain three vacancies to be filled. Mr. Lumley is actively seeking appropriate people to fill those vacancies. Senator Muir is not in the chamber and I was going to suggest to him that he write to Mr. Lumley with whatever proposals he may have.

JUSTICE

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—STATUS OF PROSECUTION

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, earlier this week Senator Roblin said that there were three outstanding questions which I had not addressed. The first question was brought up by him on December 19, 1983. I have read the proceedings between Senator Roblin and myself for that date, and I rose in the chamber to respond more fully to his question on December 21. I am not aware that there are any further matters outstanding on the subject of the uranium cartel and the status of prosecution. Senator Roblin will be aware that the Minister of Justice made a full statement on the matter and answered all of his questions, and I also repeated them in this chamber on December 21.

ENERGY

CANADA LANDS EXPLORATION

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin further referred to a question on January 17, 1984, concerning the Petroleum Incentive Program. I said I would take notice of that matter. As a result of my inquiries, I decided that the information Senator Roblin had requested was so extensive and detailed that I would not continue to pursue the matter, inasmuch as I had no ministerial responsibility for the area. I asked the deputy house leader to reply to that question. There is material being assembled, but it has not been provided to me and therefore I have not been able to give it to the deputy house leader.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, another question Senator Roblin asked me to reply to this week was relating to questions raised on May 10, 1984. At that time he was asking for financial statements and the first quarterly report. I searched my files and I recall providing him with the annual report and the first-quarter report for CDIC. I hope that deals with all of the concerns that Senator Roblin had.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he is not concerned over the Senate's dealing with 13 bills in two hours. Is this not, in effect, doing a disservice to this institution, the upper house? It seems to me that it puts this chamber back into the category of a rubber stamp.

Although I fully realize the value of passing legislation which tidies up a lot of outstanding matters, I do not think the Senate should bear the brunt of the criticism this process obviously receives in the media. It will only reinforce the concept of a rubber stamp, if it is used 13 times in a couple of hours.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is a matter of perception. Most of these bills have been in the public domain for a long time. Indeed, over the past weeks and months we referred the subject matter of many of these bills which we expected to receive to committees.

I would be the first to acknowledge that in respect of one or two of the bills that may come to us today, we may have to accept the fact that they have been in committee in the other house for weeks and, in some cases, months.

NOVA SCOTIA

SYDNEY—PROPOSED CIVIC CENTRE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to address my question to the Minister of State for Social Development. Since he is smiling, perhaps he has some good news to pass on.

On a number of occasions I have posed questions regarding the possibility of federal financial assistance for the construction of a new Civic Centre in the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia, to celebrate that city's 200th anniversary. Since the honourable senator is always up to date, I am sure he knows that the Province of Nova Scotia has committed itself to contributing $3 million towards this project on the condition that the federal government will come through with an equivalent amount.

It is my understanding that recently Senator Austin has been listening to requests for financial assistance to construct domed stadiums, auditoriums, and so on. Is he in a position today, which I presume will be the last day we will be sitting for a considerable period, to give us some small encouragement regarding this question? If he cannot give us any information today, I would be glad to hear from him on this matter at any time.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, during the course of delayed answers, before Senator Muir came into the chamber, I responded to his earlier question. I have made inquiries and, while the information he has just outlined is known to the Secretary of State, no action has been taken on the matter. That is all the information I have at the moment. I would be delighted to be in a position to assist the honourable senator further.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I apologize for not being in the chamber earlier. I also apologize to the minister, but I was busy answering telephone calls from the east coast and other parts of Canada—calls from people asking me if I knew who was going to be in the new cabinet or out of it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What did you tell them?

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Marsden, moved the third reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. John B. Stewart moved the third reading of Bill C-32, to establish the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OIL AND GAS AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill C-43, respecting the Canada-Nova Scotia Agreement on Offshore Oil and Gas Resource Management and Revenue Sharing and to make related and consequential amendments.

He said: Honourable senators, on March 2, 1982, the Governments of Canada and Nova Scotia reached an agreement on offshore oil and gas resource management and revenue sharing. I have a copy of the agreement in my hands now. Bill C-43 is the legislation that provides the machinery for carrying out the terms of this agreement. I shall review briefly the operation of this program.

Honourable senators, I should first say that, to me, this is a fine example of co-operation between the federal government and the government of a province—in this case, my own province of Nova Scotia. It provides a generous revenue-sharing arrangement for the province of Nova Scotia. Perhaps the most interesting characteristic of this bill is the fact that neither government, federal or provincial, continues to develop its claim legally to the offshore resources. They have agreed, rather, for the sake of this agreement and for the better management of the offshore resources, to put aside their claims to jurisdiction over the offshore. Each government has introduced complementary legislation to implement the terms and conditions upon which they have agreed. Indeed, a bill similar to this one—in fact, it has been referred to in some of the correspondence as a mirror image of—has already passed through the Legislature of Nova Scotia and received Royal Assent in that province. As I have said, this marks in my view an excellent measure of co-operation between the two levels of government. The two governments will therefore avoid any questions of jurisdiction by delegating authority to the appropriate minister and to a board, to which I will refer later, known as the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Oil and Gas Board.

With respect to revenue sharing, this legislation will ensure that for a very long time Nova Scotia will receive substantially more revenue than if the resources were actually on the dry land of Nova Scotia. Not only will Nova Scotia receive all of the provincial type of revenue, but it will receive all of the federal tax revenue except the federal corporate income tax. These taxes include the basic royalty, revenues equivalent to a provincial type of corporate and retail sales tax in the offshore, bonus payments and licence fees, and the largest remaining federal tax: the petroleum and gas revenue tax.

The reason for Nova Scotia's receiving this generous treatment is the fact that Nova Scotia's fiscal capacity, as measured by standards agreed upon by the federal government and the provinces, is still well below the national average, and until the province's per capita fiscal capacity reaches 110 per cent of the national average—again adjusted upward by two percentage points for each one percentage point by which the province's unemployment rate exceeds the national average—the province will receive all revenues except the federal portion of the corporate income tax. If the province's fiscal capacity exceeds 110 per cent of the national average adjusted by the unemployment factor, the federal government will then, and only then, begin to share in the offshore revenues.

All of the provincial type offshore revenues collected from the Bay of Fundy and Sable Island and its footprint will always go to the provincial government no matter how high its fiscal capacity. I have used the term "footprint" in relation to Sable Island. So far as I know, that is a term that appears for the first time in this legislation. It refers to the great masses of shifting sands which surround Sable Island and which are not the same from year to year, but which, for the purposes of this legislation, are known as the footprint of Sable Island. Their extent, as a matter of fact, is considerably greater in area than that of Sable Island itself.

In any event, as I have said, all of the revenues from the Bay of Fundy area and from Sable Island and its footprint so-called will accrue to Nova Scotia no matter what the fiscal capacity of the province may be in the future.

Nova Scotia at present receives equalization payments from the federal government, and those will be reduced as it gains offshore revenue. This is an important principle of the equalization system. However, this legislation contains special measures to protect the province from the full effect of losing equalization, at least immediately.

The province has the choice of two formulae for reducing the loss of equalization payments. Under one formula, the payments would start as soon as production from the first major offshore project begins. The province would get offset payments equal to 90 per cent of the value of the reduction in equalization payments from the time production begins to the end of the first full fiscal year following. Offset payments are then reduced by 10 per cent in each subsequent year until eventually they will be phased out. Alternatively, if the province preferred, it could postpone the beginning of offset payments for up to three full fiscal years after production begins. Once the offset payments started, they would be calculated as under the first formula and would be subject to a ceiling such that they could take the province to a per capita fiscal capacity equal to but not greater than 100 per cent of the average fiscal capacity of the ten provinces. Honourable senators, perhaps I have compressed this rather complicated matter unduly, but I believe the general import is not too difficult to understand.

I referred previously to the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Oil and Gas Board. This legislation will make the interim board a permanent institution with legal authority. I should say here that the interim board, comprised exactly as the permanent board will be composed under this legislation, has been operating harmoniously for two years and, so far as I can determine, in a manner entirely satisfactory to both federal and provincial authorities. The administrator of the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration will be the chairman of the board as he has been in the case of the interim board which he has chaired for two years. Two other board members will be appointed by the federal government and two by the provincial government. The Nova Scotia Minister of Mines and Energy will have ultimate authority for most management decisions with respect to the Bay of Fundy and Sable Island and its footprint. The federal minister will have ultimate authority in the rest of the offshore area. The appropriate minister will be able to accept or modify a decision of the board and make one in the absence of a decision from the board. The provincial board members have a right to suspend certain key decisions of the board, such as approval of an exploration agreement, development plans and benefit plans, for a period of time ranging from three months to one year.

These management provisions are important because they ensure that both federal and provincial interests are protected and they provide the petroleum industry with the certainty in the "rules of the game" that it needs in order to proceed with development of offshore resources. Although there are mechanisms to protect both federal and provincial interests, during its two years in existence as an interim body the board has never used these mechanisms. Decisions were invariably made on the basis of a consensus. We expect this will continue to be the way the board reaches most of its decisions, hopefully all its decisions, in the future.

I should also refer to another feature in this legislation that is of assistance to the province of Nova Scotia. That is the establishment of a development fund which will be in the amount of $200 million to be created from federal revenues entirely. It is designed to help the provincial government defray the costs of providing infrastructure to promote offshore petroleum activity in a timely manner. Funds will be made available for four years at a rate of $50 million per year beginning this year, 1984. The remaining balance in the fund will be carried forward until production begins, ensuring that money is available for approved projects as they are developed. The province will reimburse the fund but repayment will be spread over ten years and begin only in the third year after natural gas or oil production has begun.

The Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration, or COGLA as it is popularly known, provides for a crown share of oil and gas resources. This crown share is 25 per cent of the resources to which it refers. This legislation enables Nova Scotia, at its discretion, to acquire up to 50 per cent of the crown share in a natural gas field and up to 25 per cent of the crown share in an oil field once a significant discovery has been declared. That means that Nova Scotia could acquire 12.5 per cent of the resources in a gas field and 6.25 per cent of the resources in an oil field, since this would be 50 per cent of 25 per cent in one case and 25 per cent of 25 per cent in the other case. This bill does not in any way change the crown share provisions as set out in the Canada Oil and Gas Act. Rather, it deals with how the crown share is divided between the federal and provincial governments.

There is another provision in the bill guaranteeing that before approval is given for new oil or gas trunk pipelines related to offshore activity, the provincial government will be given the opportunity to participate in an ownership interest of up to 50 per cent of the project on terms that a commercial investor would reasonably expect. In other words, if it wishes to acquire its own title to a pipeline that may relate to this offshore development, Nova Scotia will have to pay its share, and by so doing it can acquire an equity of up to 50 per cent of those pipelines. The bill also provides that Nova Scotia will benefit first from any new oil and gas production in the offshore. New oil or gas production will be made available commercially in Nova Scotia to serve consumer needs and as a feedstock for existing industry before it is sold outside the province. New industrial facilities will be ensured of the availability of feedstocks as long as these feedstocks are in excess of what is needed to meet the demand of existing industrial capacity in eastern Canada. This latter provision applies to eastern Canada beyond the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia.

In summary, this bill would require petroleum companies negotiating exploration agreements to submit plans showing, to the satisfaction of the Canada-Nova Scotia Board, how residents of the province would benefit from the activity. Specifically, the companies would show how they propose to employ residents in all aspects of the exploration program, and how the companies will provide manufacturers, consultants, contractors and service companies based in Nova Scotia with a full and fair opportunity to compete in the supply of goods and services to exploration programs. Also, companies will be required to submit programs satisfactory to both governments for education, training and research and technology development.

I should conclude my remarks by referring to what has been accomplished under this agreement to date, operating as it has been under the informally constituted board. Some 33 exploration agreements have been signed for activity off the coast of Nova Scotia. Under these agreements, petroleum companies have committed themselves to spending more than $2.4 billion over the duration of these 33 agreements which have already been approved. In 1983, approximately $150 million was invested in Nova Scotia. Approximately 2,000 jobs have been created directly by petroleum activity and several hundred more because of the multiplier effect of such activity.

About 200 companies in Nova Scotia are participants in the offshore effort. Many are local firms that specialize in marine and logistical services as well as in fabrication. Several companies have moved to Nova Scotia in order to participate in offshore activity.

If I may interject a personal note here, last week when I returned to Halifax I had the honour and pleasure of representing the federal government at the launching of an under-sea craft called the Deep Rover, a one-man submersible, or mini-submarine, capable of working on the ocean floor down to 1,000 metres or even lower. This craft was manufactured entirely in the Halifax-Dartmouth area, with the exception of the arms that enable the machine to work outside the enclosure containing the operator of the machine. These arms were made by a related company in California and are extremely sensitive. I was told that they could pick up an egg without breaking it or they could pick up objects weighing as much as 200 pounds. It is hoped that this prototype, to which the Government of Canada contributed $960,000, will be duplicated again and again and eventually sold all over the world. As I said, it was manufactured in the Dartmouth area of Nova Scotia. If it is—and the developers are very certain that they will have contracts to do so—even the sensor arms will be manufactured in Canada because the licences and techniques will be transferred from the California company to a company incorporated in Canada. Honourable senators, this just happened to be brought to my attention when I was asked to represent the federal minister at the launching of this craft the other day. This company is of course one of the 200 that I have referred to in my text as having been established in Nova Scotia as a result of the offshore oil activity.

This year we expect a record level of rig activity off the coast of Nova Scotia. We expect as many as ten separate rigs to be working the offshore at one time or another throughout the year. In 1983 there were some eight rigs in operation; in 1982 there were six; in 1981 there were two; and in each of the three preceding years there was one rig in operation each year. Thus, Nova Scotia has benefited and is benefiting considerably from offshore exploration. We all hope that before too long this will turn into the production of oil and gas and become an on-going and continuing source of revenue and employment to the province of Nova Scotia.

As I said at the outset, I think this method of resolving the uncertainty about offshore jurisdiction is very good. I am glad the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada have been able to agree on such a sensible working arrangement, as is legally provided for in Bill C-43.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Hicks.]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, could Senator Hicks tell us whether the agreement envisaged in the bill before us is something of a precedent? I believe, although I am not sure, that this is the first time an agreement of this type has been made between Ottawa and a provincial government.

Senator Hicks: That is correct, Senator Rowe. This bill provides—I am not sure I can put my finger on the clause, but if pressed I will try to find it—that, if other arrangements are made with other provinces that provide more favourable terms than are contained here, Nova Scotia will be able to benefit by them as well. From that, I presume that the federal authorities feel that this may be some kind of precedent that can be extended to apply to other provincial jurisdictions as well.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I wish to begin my remarks by informing you that this is probably the last occasion on which my voice will be heard in this chamber. That will leave some of you with mixed feelings. There will be some who will feel that that is a good thing—

Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Donahoe:—and there will be others who will view it with a degree of regret—

Hon. Senators: Yes, yes.

Senator Donahoe: However, whichever way you view it, it happens to be a fact.

Honourable senators, in rising to discuss the bill which has been so learnedly explained to us this morning, I hasten to assure you that while I intend to disclose my attitude toward this bill I do not intend to deal with it in detail, nor as knowledgeably as did my friend Senator Hicks in presenting it. I will explain why I adopt a course that is slightly different from his.

There is a great temptation to illustrate, as Senator Hicks did, how well informed you are, how much you know, how well you can express yourself and go into minute detail in respect of a bill of this nature. However, I will resist that temptation, as he was unable to do. I will resist the opportunity and express my views a little later.

During my years of serving in this chamber I listened carefully and extensively to the speeches made here. I never noticed that there was any slavish observance of any rules of relevancy in what was being said. In other words, I feel that often senators got to their feet and expressed their general sentiments with little regard, if any, for whether it was the appropriate time to do so. Perhaps I will be forgiven this morning if I say a word or two about matters which some people might be unkind enough to say are irrelevant to this bill.

The first thing that impresses me this morning is that I rise in the midst of stirring times. We are witnessing events taking place in this Canada of ours which are almost unparalleled. In fact, not since the days of Mr. Pearson's leaving power have we seen such a tremendous struggle for benefits by those persons who are affected by the leaving of a Prime Minister. We are witnessing an amazing spectacle. It is a spectacle of ministers in the government and supporters of the government unashamedly scrambling for preferential places and, in many cases, hoping against hope that they will receive their just reward before the hurricane strikes. It is very interesting to hear of minister after minister disappearing and not because they have been a particular success. One can only judge that the services they rendered were unacceptable to the man who is now about to govern this country. For years the affairs of this country were directed by people who are no longer wanted, whose efforts are not respected now and the sooner they are out the better.

Above all, of course, they have demonstrated their loyalty to the Liberal Party, and therefore they must be rewarded. A place must be found for them, and while we will no longer entrust the affairs of the country to their hands we will see to it that they do not suffer personally.

I rise in this chamber almost at the very minute when we are seeing Canada being relieved from the great socialist influence that has affected its conduct of affairs in the last number of years. I would think that each of my honourable friends opposite would rise to acclaim, "Thank God the Liberal Party, to which I have been so devoted, which I have served so well and which I have allowed to dictate to me what I should say when I rise in the Senate chamber, and the attitudes I should take, is at last about to be placed in the hands of someone who will not be open to a charge of being a socialistic prime minister, but one who is more likely to inspire confidence in the people of Canada." He will more likely be guided by what we in this country have come to consider as true Liberal principles.

I stand here and look across the chamber and see empty seats that were occupied by ministers in a government that ceases to be a government tomorrow morning. I do not know whether there is any significance in the fact that those seats are now empty. I read in the newspapers that the persons who have occupied those seats may not hold their positions much longer. I find it difficult to believe that they have held their ministerial posts only because of a paucity of members of their party in the areas that they come from. They were appointed to represent certain provincial interests that, if they were not represented here, would go without representation in this government. I find it difficult to believe that anyone, even a new prime minister, endeavouring to put a new face on things, would find that he could afford to dispense with their services. However, I feel sorry for them because if he does dispense with their services, then it is perfectly clear that no matter how hard they worked, no matter how hard they tried, no matter what positions they took in the Senate, or what views they expressed, all these things were not good enough to keep them in the government of this country. I hope I am wrong. I am only repeating what I read in the newspapers or hear in the media, that the senators who are now cabinet ministers will cease to be cabinet ministers when the new cabinet is announced. This may be so, but I hope not for their sake.

I heard on the radio this morning that this might be the day that the government decides to discontinue the Canadian Sports Pool, that ill-starred attempt to raise money for valid purposes but by a method which it was not their right to pursue. They had no right to intervene in that area. I have heard many arguments about the differentiation between pools and lotteries, but to my mind, they are puerile and ineffectual arguments and I am delighted to find that the government has reached the same conclusion. My leader must be very interested today to know that the true state of those pools and the true value of them is now being exposed. I watched his attempts to elicit information respecting the sports pools, and I watched him being put off. Now we know the truth. Now we know that this was an ill-fated venture, I cannot help but think that it is appropriate I should have been asked to speak here this morning. I would like to express my thanks to my leader and my whip for asking me to represent our caucus on this particular subject. It has given me a great opportunity to say something that I wanted to get off my chest.

I have thoroughly enjoyed my five years in the Senate. I have appreciated more than I can express the kindness and courtesy extended to me in an unfailing manner by all of the people in this house. I have been treated with kindness and courtesy by those who sit opposite me, in spite of my sometimes puerile attempts at tongue-lashing. Notwithstanding that, they have accepted me as I am. They have treated me in a kind and unqualified manner as a gentleman. I am very grateful to them and I want to say to them that I regret that this may or may not be my last speech. The time fast approaches, although the calendar has not quite caught up with me, when I must retire from the Senate. However, when that day arrives we may well find that we are in the process of replacing the present government with a more effective one. If that is so, I may or may not get the opportunity to speak in the chamber again. In any event, as I have said, I am grateful to those on the opposite side of this chamber and I am grateful to those on my own side. I have formed warm and close relationships and have been inspired to think kindly of all of my colleagues, and I want them to know that that is my feeling as I leave this chamber.

Honourable senators, I started to talk about the Canadian Sports Pool, and I do not want to leave that subject without saying that I understand that it was a minister from Nova Scotia who was largely instrumental in bringing about that legislation. I also understand from what I read that he is about to be elevated to a position of authority in the government with respect to my province, because the man who has been exercising that authority has voluntarily moved aside and has said, "I have made enough mistakes in my time. I have done enough harm. It is time that someone else has a chance to show what he can do." As I say, the minister who will now have the responsibility for my province was the minister largely responsible for the Canadian Sports Pool legislation. I only wish to say to him that I hope he will discharge any obligations that may accrue to him in respect of the province of Nova Scotia more happily and successfully than he did the sports pool legislation, which has resulted only in the bleeding of millions of dollars from the Canadian taxpayer in the interests of funding the Olympic Winter Games.

It is interesting to note, upon reading the newspapers and listening to the other media, that because of the failure of the sports pool to produce revenue to support the Olympic Games, the provinces will be asked to contribute the money. Unless Mr. Turner finds some alternative legal way of raising the funds, the provinces will have to do so.

As I stand here today, about to bid farewell to this chamber, I am encouraged by the fact that we are living in an atmosphere of new hope. We have the hope that new ideas will permeate the government of this country. We have the hope that new policies will lead to more success than we have had at any time in the 16 years that we have been governed by the man who is resigning today.

We all hope that the falling dollar will reach an acceptable level and will, as I heard some optimist say, rebound even further. I sincerely hope that that is the case. I sincerely hope that interest rates, which in the past few days have become higher than they have been for more than two or three years, will reach acceptable levels as a result of a renewed confidence in government. I sincerely hope that this infusion of new hope, of new ideas and a new administration will take place as soon as the Canadian public has an opportunity to replace the "retread" government of John Turner with a new government under Brian Mulroney.

Honourable senators, I think I have said enough. I am sure that in the opinion of some people I have said too much. Let me conclude by referring to the bill. This bill is the result of negotiations between the Province of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada, and, as one would believe from what my honourable colleague said this morning, has already been in effect to a great and important extent. It has great possibilities. If ever a bill required the stamp of approval of the Senate, this is it. I say that because our responsibility as senators is to represent the regions of the country, and here we are this morning considering a bill that is the end product of negotiations between a provincial government and the Canadian government. Therefore, I do not believe that it behooves us to consider in any way how we can improve the bill.

This is a good bill. We were told it was a good bill. It has good features and holds out some hope for the province of Nova Scotia. If it were not a good bill, we would not be considering it this morning, because if it were not to be of some benefit to Nova Scotia, the province would not have entered into the agreement reached as a result of those negotiations. I say that because I have every confidence that that government acts only in the best interests of the province of Nova Scotia. Thus, when that province enters into an agreement with the national government, I am satisfied that it is a good agreement.

[Senator Donahoe.]

That should not be understood to mean that it is the best of all possible bills or the best of all possible agreements, in spite of what my honourable friend has had to say.

I was titillated by the fact that it was a Newfoundlander who first tendered certain inquiries about the bill, when Senator Hicks had concluded his exposition of it. I want to say to that Newfoundlander that his premier did not sign such a bill, and could not enter into such an agreement, because, in his opinion, it would not hold out enough benefit to the province of Newfoundland.

I hasten to say that there may be distinctions between the province of Newfoundland and the province of Nova Scotia. After all, without the province of Nova Scotia we might never have had a Canada. Nova Scotia entered into Confederation in 1867; Newfoundland is the most recent addition, having entered in 1949 under entirely different circumstances. The people of Newfoundland had an opportunity to see how the other provinces had been treated, and on that basis alone a distinction can be made between the province of Newfoundland and the province of Nova Scotia.

In any event, the Government of Newfoundland was not prepared to enter into a similar agreement because the premier of that province felt there was an opportunity of obtaining better terms. We have been told that the federal government has been generous, and perhaps it has; perhaps it has yielded up some of its rights in this agreement, but the fact remains that it did not yield up enough to entice Newfoundland.

Recently, a discussion on this issue was held between the Premier of Newfoundland and the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. It is of great interest to know that the Premier of Newfoundland has expressed himself as being optimistic, hopeful and ready to enter into an agreement on the terms Mr. Mulroney will provide. I can only conclude, therefore, as I think all reasonable senators must, that those terms will be generous and more worthwhile than the terms accepted by the Province of Nova Scotia.

It was with great pleasure that I learned that within the framework of this bill there may be machinery by which the federal government can improve the terms of the agreement, because I am one who happens to speak this morning with the ultimate conviction that the people who signed the agreement are not going to be the people who will carry it out. The Government of Nova Scotia will be there, but the Government of Canada will change. It is interesting to know that the people who are going to effect that change and are going to exercise power in this country are people who are kindly and well disposed towards all of the provinces on this particular issue. So I am relieved to know that with this bill the federal government may—I was going to say "confess its errors", but that's too extreme—feel that, not having been sufficiently generous in the first place, it will now revise the agreement and enter into a new one.

For the reasons that I have expressed—namely, that entering into the agreement was a considered act of the Province of Nova Scotia; that there are benefits to the province of Nova Scotia in this bill; that the provincial authority saw fit to enter into the agreement with the federal government, and that, between them, they hold all the powers of sovereignty in this matter—I am satisfied that we in this appointed chamber ought not to interfere in any way.

I am pleased that I was given this opportunity to speak on a bill which affects Nova Scotia at this time. I was appointed to represent, as I have often been told, regional interests. Well, I come from Nova Scotia and am proud to say so, and I like to think that during my years in this chamber I have endeavoured to express the point of view of Nova Scotia on the many issues that have come before us. I have no regrets about that. I seized every opportunity I could to voice the concerns of my province and I have no feeling as I leave the Senate today that my sojourn in the Senate has been wasted. I have a strong feeling that the Senate is a much maligned body and that we accomplish much in this chamber that goes unnoticed or is badly understood. I had an opportunity only yesterday of speaking to a young Nova Scotian civics student. He asked me a number of questions relating to civic and government matters. I would judge from listening to that young man that a great many of the ideas that have been instilled in him by his teachers and professors would not appeal to the members of this house. I think that the Senate needs better advertising.

If I may express disagreement with my leaders, I believe that no useful effect will be achieved by electing members to the Senate. I have heard the Deputy Leader of the Opposition express an opposite view to mine on a few occasions and I do not expect to convince him, but I can see no benefit or use in electing members to this chamber. I cannot, any more than my colleague the party whip could, as he said the other afternoon, see what benefits could accrue to this house.

The totality of national powers is between the provinces and the federal government, and in the same sense the totality of the national powers is between the House of Commons and the Senate, and if we lack authority now, and if, as the committee on the subject suggests, no additional authority is to be given to us, then I can see no advantage in having an elected Senate. Elected senators will not be any more useful. In fact they will be less useful because they will be frustrated. They will be men and women who will have submitted themselves to the electorate, who will have felt the approval of the electorate only to come to a chamber that leaves them powerless to affect substantially the course of events. Therefore, I cannot see that they will be one bit better off by having been elected than we are by having been appointed. If they are elected, all of the defects of the election, which the honourable senator pointed out yesterday, will accrue. I believe that they will be under obligation to party and to political friends, and that they will sit in this chamber owing debts to people. We may be appointed, but we are free.

On the question of appointment I want to say to my honourable friends that, under the present disposition, we are appointed to this Senate by the Prime Minister of Canada under the identical conditions in force for the selection and appointment of justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. I am just as good as any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. The Prime Minister of Canada said that he wanted me in the Senate, and no judge can say more. He can only say that insofar as this court is concerned the Prime Minister of Canada wanted me to serve in this court. But honourable senators on the other side are responsible for a whole new disposition on constitutional questions in this country. Willy-nilly, rightfully or wrongfully, understanding or not understanding what they were doing, they have succeeded in transferring the ultimate source of power away from the seats of the elected members and into the hands of the appointed ones. When you hear people say that the Senate is not an effective body because it is an appointed body, then you can reply that every argument you can make with respect to the method of appointment of senators applies with equal force at the present time to the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. They are vested with tremendous authority. Yet, the committee has recommended that we not be given any additional authority.

I have talked long, and yet I have mentioned only a few of the things that have occurred to me as a result of my service in this chamber. I should like to repeat again that I am delighted to have been here; I am delighted with the treatment I have received and I am grateful to have met all of you and to know you, and if I never return I will have fond and good memories of you. But if I do return, I promise not to harangue you in the way I have this morning.

In closing, I urge you to support the bill. It is a good bill, in the sense that it represents an agreement between the only two forces that have the right to enter into that agreement. Therefore, I support its passage. It did not require the excellent treatment that it received in its presentation because you should have been satisfied to say, "If Nova Scotia is satisfied and the Government of Canada is satisfied and if they have entered into an agreement, then who am I to stand between them?" I urge you to support this bill and as I resume my seat on this occasion I want to say that it is my heartfelt wish that all of you live through and enjoy the national holiday—Dominion Day—that we are about to celebrate on July 1.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I join in this debate on the first branch of Senator Donahoe's intervention—and perhaps I can be extended the same courtesy as far as relevancy is concerned—I should like to say that while Senator Donahoe and I disagree on just about everything that he has said, that comes as no news to him or to anyone else in this chamber.

I am a strong supporter of the party system. I consider it one of the most important parts of our democratic system, although it is not mentioned at all in the Constitution and is only mentioned in a few statutes dealing with election expenses and that sort of thing. The French word for "supporter" is "militant," and I think that the French word would apply to Senator Donahoe when it comes to support for his party because his support is never less than militant. I cannot agree with what he said about the outgoing government or about many of the other things that he expressed—

Senator Donahoe: Or the incoming government either.

Senator Frith: Yes, depending on which incoming government you are referring to. Even on that, we would not agree.

On behalf of the government and myself, I am glad that we have had the pleasure, the fun and the honour to have shared this chamber with Senator Donahoe. As you know, he had a very distinguished career in politics and in law. He came to us as a former Attorney General, the highest law officer in any province and, in his case, Nova Scotia. He founded a dynasty of which he is the father and godfather.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And the patriarch.

Senator Frith: And the patriarch, indeed. We are glad that he crowned such a successful career and successful life with service in the Senate. We are pleased to have had the opportunity to share that experience with him. We wish him a long, happy, fruitful and, I am sure, militant life, when he retires.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Donahoe that the rules of relevancy have never been discussed at length in this chamber. Freedom of speech as we know it goes back to the period when Senator Martin was Leader of the Government. He could make anything relevant. When I was Deputy Speaker in the house I once told him to keep his remarks relevant. He told me that whatever argument he could make, if it was his own view and, in his view, relevant to the conclusion that he would make, then the Speaker could not intervene. Following that exchange, I completely abandoned any argument in favour of relevancy.

I had not anticipated having to say anything about the eventual retirement of Senator Donahoe today because his retirement only comes into effect in three or four months. If the incoming Prime Minister is not prepared to face the electorate soon, we should be sitting in September and at that time Senator Donahoe will still be with us.

Honourable senators, on this side we had occasion a few weeks ago to gather together to express our sentiments to Senator Donahoe and his wife. I think that the deputy leader has expressed very well how all of us in this chamber feel with respect to this great gentleman—this great Nova Scotian. As Senator Frith said, Senator Donahoe is the father of two well-known parliamentarians in Nova Scotia, the Minister of Education and the Speaker of the House, and he himself enjoyed an extensive career in the Nova Scotia government and the assembly.

Senator Donahoe has been a great companion and friend not only to this side but to everyone in this chamber.

I do not want to say now that we will miss him because I hope we will see him again before that fateful day on which he is forced to retire. If that should not be the case, then I want him to know that he leaves with our very best wishes, our warm affection and our great admiration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hicks speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-43.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, in view of the extraordinary intervention of Senator Donahoe on second reading of Bill C-43 and some other matters—and the aiding and abetting of his irrelevancy by Senators Frith and Flynn—I think it is unnecessary for me to say anything else on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I see no point in referring this bill to committee. As I explained in my remarks, it coincides with an act already on the statute books of the Province of Nova Scotia.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-30, to amend the Bank Act, is a very short bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is it simple?

Senator Frith: I never say that, but I can say it is short. It amends subsection 302(7) of the Bank Act by changing the figure of 8 per cent to 16 per cent. The purpose of the bill is to raise the domestic asset ceiling on foreign bank subsidiaries operating in Canada, of which there are now approximately 60.

The 1980 Bank Act revisions provided for the first time that foreign bank subsidiaries could become full members of the Canadian banking community. That policy was undertaken to increase competition, to bring existing foreign bank officers under federal regulation and to respond to pressures for banking reciprocity from abroad. As honourable senators know, at that time Canadian banks already had subsidiaries outside of Canada.

The existing legislation provides that the total domestic assets of the foreign bank subsidiaries shall be limited to 8 per cent of the total domestic assets of the entire banking system.

At that time the expectation was that, as the domestic assets of Canadian banks grew, so could the domestic assets of the foreign bank subsidiaries. However, the very slow growth of the banking system's assets, which began in late 1982, resulted in the ceiling being approached much sooner than had been anticipated. Therefore, the House of Commons Finance Committee conducted a study in light of the consequences following from the 8 per cent ceiling being reached, since it was obviously about to be reached very soon.

Last fall the committee made a report on the foreign bank subsidiaries operating in Canada and recommended that the present ceiling of 8 per cent be increased to 16 per cent.

Although the committee recommended the elimination of a fixed market share limit on the foreign bank subsidiaries, concerns were raised that the financial services industry should not be allowed to fall under foreign domination. The committee advocated that the growth of foreign bank subsidiaries be controlled on the basis of: first, reciprocity of banking regulations abroad; second, the degree to which a foreign bank subsidiary can or does contribute to competitive banking services in Canada; third, the solvency of the foreign bank and its Canadian subsidiary; and, fourth, the diversity of lending services.

Bill C-30 raises the domestic assets ceiling on foreign bank subsidiaries operating in Canada from 8 per cent to 16 per cent rather than removing the market share restriction entirely, as recommended originally by the House of Commons Finance Committee.

Canadian non-bank financial institutions made representations before the House of Commons Finance Committee arguing that they should receive legislative consideration before foreign banks. As a result of these interventions, the committee recommended that a complete review of legislation concerning financial institutions be initiated. That review is being conducted in a number of different forums, including the private sector panel of the Minister of State for Finance.

Honourable senators, if we pass this bill, we are, in effect, accepting the recommendation of the House of Commons Finance Committee that the 8 per cent share be increased to 16 per cent, subject to the four criteria I mentioned.

Honourable senators, I ask for support on second reading.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is an interesting bill because it deals with an aspect of the Canadian financial structure in which we all have a direct interest.

One of the merits of our system—certainly one on which Canadians have from time to time congratulated themselves, whether they should have done so or not—is that our banking system has been a very stable one. The stability and the strength of the Canadian banking system in good times and bad have been amply demonstrated over the last 40 years. Possibly the last Canadian bank which went under was the Home Bank. Since that time we have had a very stable banking system, and it has been an attractive feature of our financial community.

However, the result has been that up until quite recently a small number of banks have occupied the field in Canada. One talks of the "big five." In recent years there has been an addition to the "big five" because a number of local, regional banks have taken advantage of a change in circumstances to enter this field as well. In my opinion, that has to be all to the good. The big step that was made the other year, however, was to open the Canadian banking system to foreign banks—banks which were domiciled outside the country but which could come in to establish Canadian outlets and to take part in the Canadian banking business.

I am aware that there was a considerable body of opinion that was alarmed about that on the principle that it might be deleterious to the stability of our banking system. Consumers of credit have not had that opinion. Consumers of credit, I think, have believed generally that competition in the banking system is not keen enough and that it ought to be greater. Indeed, one of the prime reasons, I suspect, for opening the door for the entry of foreign banks—even to the extent of 8 per cent, as the deputy leader has said—surely has to be in terms of an effort to deal, partially at least, with the desire for more competition in the Canadian banking system.

Honourable senators, I quite agree with that. The original move left roughly 92 per cent of the banking business, if one wishes to look at it in such terms, to the Canadian banks. This bill doubles the percentage available to foreign banks and reduces the percentage of the Canadian banks to 84 per cent. I have no objection to that. I think it is a move that is advantageous. It has the prospect of further increasing competition in the Canadian banking system.

I have long held the view that one of the merits of the American banking system is that banks are much more local in their operation. The First National Bank of Minneapolis, for example, would rise or fall on the activities of the economic sector around Minneapolis. Although the American banks are moving more and more to a branch banking system, local banks have been quite effective, I think, in making credit available in places where it might otherwise not be.

One of the complaints that has been voiced quite often in western Canada is whether or not credit was adequately available to people who needed it in the west. I am not going to enter into that argument because it is a complicated one. The present banking system can produce some fairly impressive facts about the credit that they make available in regions such as my own. But I think even if their claims are completely correct, it will do no harm, and conceivably will do a great deal of good, if we increase the number of banking operations in the whole of this country and offer to the consumer more markets which he may search for the supply of credit. One would hope that the cost of credit would also enter into the equation.

It seems to me that this bill should do some good. It does not, in my opinion at any rate, threaten the stability of the present banking system in this country because no one would like to do that. It does, however, provide for considerable expansion in the area of competition with respect to banking services.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I would be glad to support this legislation. I will surprise my honourable friend by saying that, if he decides not to send the bill to committee, he will get no objection from me. I would be prepared to give it third reading without delay.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the bill before us today is one to amend the Bank Act.

I should like to talk about another feature of our banking system—I use the expression more in quotation marks—to say that in my opinion there should be accelerated attention given to making the entire system more competitive than it is now. In saying that, I refer to that important segment of our lending institutions, the credit unions and the caisses populaires.

Across this country there are ten million Canadians who are members of credit unions or caisses populaires. For a long time those institutions have been anxious for an equal opportunity to compete within the financial system of this country. Although moves in that direction have been forthcoming, they have been unduly slow. Over the last couple of years some major advances have been made in giving the credit unions the right, under the law, to compete in a more effective way and in larger areas with the banking institutions. Some of the credit unions are now becoming members of the Canadian Payments Association, the clearing house for cheques, along with the banks. I am informed that this is of major help to the credit unions, and I am informed that it has had the effect of augmenting their income.

Approximately a year and a half ago, amendments to the Financial Administration Act were made, which amendments allowed credit unions for the first time in history to accept deposits of the Government of Canada. Up to that point it was illegal for the Government of Canada to deposit its own money in credit unions. What happened at one point a couple of years ago was this: many credit union and caisse populaire members, as good Canadians and as investors, bought Canada Savings Bonds. Because of that, all at once something over $300 million was scooped out of the credit union system. This put them in grave financial difficulty because the federal government had to remove its money immediately and could not put it into the credit unions. An amendment was therefore made to the law so that it now permits the credit unions and the caisses populaires to compete with the banking system. Those institutions feel that they are on an equal basis with the banks with respect to deposits of the Government of Canada.

The credit union movement constitutes about 10 per cent of our banking system in the larger sense, and it is now estimated to receive about 10 per cent of federal deposits. The credit unions are happy with that and they like it that way. But they have been asking for amendments to the act under which the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society operates. That society is the central organization for credit unions. The request is that the law should be broadened, because at present they are allowed to lend only to members of the co-operatives. They would like to get out into the broader lending field, not only because they want to be more competitive in extending their credit to a larger group of Canadians, but also because they think it would broaden their own financial base and, in a sense, remove some of the risk in having it confined, as it now is, to only one segment of the economy. If they were to use good management—and I am sure they would—they could make investments that might give them a higher return.

The request has been that the act should be changed so that 20 per cent of their assets could be lent outside of their own credit union and co-operative system. In discussions with representatives of those institutions, I have indicated that in my view the 20 per cent limit should not be set out in legislation but that it should be up to the Governor in Council to adjust the limit from time to time. I am sure that, if that were done on the basis of recommendations from the credit unions themselves, the agreed ceiling would be a satisfactory one. I would like to see that come forward. I am told that amendments are necessary to the Trust Companies Act, and some of us were trying to get a package put before Parliament which would include the banks, trust companies and credit union centrals. However, that has not been possible, and I am placing on the record the request of credit unions and caisses populaires that there should be a response from the federal government and the Canadian Parliament to provide Canadians who belong to the co-operative movement an opportunity to compete on an equal basis with the banks.

When we are talking about competition and wanting to open up the banking system to foreign banks—which raises another major and troublesome question—surely we should be taking collective action that will permit competition from the co-operative movement in this country. It is possibly too late for action during the term of this Parliament, but I am placing these remarks on the record in the hope that the subject may be referred to by others in the future and appropriate action taken.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I had not intended to make an intervention, but I have listened with interest to what has been said and I am rather concerned about the fact that this amendment to the Bank Act has come to us with the report of a committee of the other place. I do not recall such a procedure occurring very often in this chamber. Usually over the years when such bills have come forward, they have been referred to our own committee, which over the years has perhaps had as high a standing as any committee on the Hill. That committee has always taken the time to hear witnesses and to give full consideration to bills.

I believe it has been clearly indicated that the Canadian public wants more competition in the banking system and that it wants greater access to credit. No doubt what is being done now is probably a step in the right direction, but I am not at all sure whether the limit should be 16 per cent or 20 per cent or 12 per cent. It is wise to have a limitation, because that was the opinion of Parliament when foreign banks were permitted to do business in Canada. However, I feel that we are now proceeding in haste on a bill that is of some considerable importance. Although it is a short bill, it is an important one. I cannot help but agree with what my colleague, Senator Argue, has said. If we are going to expand the banking system and provide consumers with more credit, then I am not sure that we have to do it through a foreign system, and I would rather like to hear more about it.

Honourable senators will recall that when the question of foreign banks being licensed in Canada was first discussed some years ago, one of the problems was that the subsidiaries of the great American international corporations, such as General Motors, Chrysler, the major oil companies, and so on, quite logically extended their banking relationships to this country, the effect of which was not particularly advantageous to our own banking system.

I believe that the extension of the number of Canadian chartered banks or regional banks in recent times has been quite good. I believe that we have made more credit available, and I hope that the cost has been reduced. That is all to the good, and perhaps the 16 per cent limit on foreign banks is also to the good. However, I ask myself "What is the great hurry concerning this legislation?" Are we in this chamber not setting a precedent in accepting a report of another committee at which no member of the Senate was present? We have not had an opportunity to express an opinion or to call witnesses whose views may be important to the whole scheme. As Senator Roblin said a few moments ago, we must all recognize that the banking system in Canada, with all of its faults, has been one of our great financial successes, and has withstood a number of shocks over the years. Honourable senators may recall that during the days of President Roosevelt, when banks in the United States were closing almost by the second, our own banks weathered the storm, and, over the years, have weathered similar storms extraordinarily well. The stability of our financial system has been a matter of great credit to Canada and a source of satisfaction to all thinking people.

We now have this bill before us and we have been given only a short time in which to pass it. I cannot see why there should be this haste or why we should rubber stamp it. At present there are disturbing factors in the Canadian financial world, and some of us are concerned about the trust companies. For some years now there has been a tendency for trust companies to get rolled up into large financial conglomerates, financial organizations comprising investment companies, insurance companies and trust companies. The control and function of trust companies, which should be to take care of people's money, legacies, wills, and other financial problems has changed to a great degree, and I am not sure that the change has been in the right direction.

I do not like to see legislation passed in haste without being given full consideration. For that reason I am not in favour of the passage of this bill at this time.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that when the Bank Act was amended a number of years ago to permit foreign banks to operate in Canada, the purpose was to provide greater competition in the domestic market and to give more latitude to borrowers to choose the source of their loans. At that time it was also indicated that foreign banks would assist small businesses with their financial needs. Recently it has come to my attention that some foreign banks in Canada have not lived up to that commitment. I, too, have the same reservation that Senator Molson has, namely, that I would have preferred to see this bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, because that would have given us an opportunity to ask the representatives of foreign banks pertinent questions in relation to their mandate.

I realize that there is pressure to pass this bill in its present form, but I hope that in the near future an opportunity will be provided to discuss this matter when a similar bill comes before us. In my opinion, it would be advisable for honourable senators to question representatives of foreign banks to ensure that they are living up to their original commitment.

Senator Frith: I have nothing further to add in reply.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Financial Administration Act in relation to Crown corporations and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-24 is not simple, short or of minor importance.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Nor is it timely.

Senator Frith: It is of major importance and it is quite complicated. Therefore, as sponsor of the bill, I want to make it quite clear why I am asking the Senate to pass it today. It seems to me that we can only do so on faith and I cannot put it any higher than that. This bill had a pretty stormy voyage in the other place. It came forward with the object, which I think most parliamentarians consider worthy, of increasing the supervisory role of Parliament over crown corporations and of making them subject to greater supervision by Parliament and by agencies of Parliament such as the Auditor General. The original bill included some crown agencies that felt they ought not to be covered by it, particularly cultural institutions. That was one cause of the difficulties in the other place and, consequently, the bill soon became the subject of a great deal of work by all parties of the other place and by a parliamentary committee. According to some members of the opposition, the bill that resulted from that work does not resemble very much the government's original bill. To put it in a positive way, the bill we have before us is, to use an expression often used in the United States, bipartisan or, better yet, tripartisan in nature.

While the other place was debating this bill last night, some members of the opposition who had worked very hard on it and were very vocal and persistent critics of it in its original form saw good reason to rejoice in the final bill, which is what we have before us. This bill is the result of a good deal of work and a good deal of amendment. The legislative framework for control of our crown corporations has not had a major overhaul in over 30 years. Various attempts have been made to do so both legislatively and administratively. None has been successful until this bill. Members from both sides of the House of Commons have worked diligently these past several weeks, using mainly the vehicle of parliamentary committee, to reach agreement on a package of amendments. This speaks highly of the willingness on the part of the government, the official opposition and other members, to carefully consider the views expressed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and by committee witnesses, including the Auditor General, the business community and other interested parties such as the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. The government and opposition reached agreement to limit debate and to try to obtain passage of the bill and Royal Assent by the time the current session of Parliament adjourns.

Honourable senators, I have had very little time to study this bill.

Senator Roblin: Fifteen minutes?

Senator Frith: I looked at the bill last night and had a bit of a briefing this morning. I regret to say that I cannot take this bill and, as we say in the courts, lead you by the hand through the various wordings and the methods by which the objectives of the bill are reached. So I have to take it on faith that this has been done in the other place. In other words, what I am about to say about what the bill accomplishes will have to be accepted, because if someone asked me where it said this or that I am afraid I would not be able to answer satisfactorily.

The purpose of the bill, as I mentioned, is to clarify the roles and responsibilities of officers, boards of directors, ministers, the government, and Parliament with regard to crown corporations and to have in place a sound, updated legislative framework for the control and accountability of these corporations. The bill as passed by the lower house will create that framework.

I would like to give you some of the highlights. First, the cultural agencies, the Canada Council, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board, the Arts Centre Corporation and the Canadian Film Development Corporation, have been removed from the purview of the bill. It is the government's intention to clarify its accountability framework for them and other cultural corporations where necessary through separate legislative measures. One amendment deals with the question of binding the Crown. Honourable senators will know the law is that for the Crown to be bound it must be specifically mentioned. The Department of Justice felt that the bill was adequate in its original form but, to make sure, an amendment was agreed to which eliminated any uncertainty about the matter.

Another provision which caused anxiety was the special motion provision, which allowed the creation of crown corporations by acts of Parliament by special motion. The special motion provided for automatic time limitation so that that no time allocation would be placed. The opposition succeeded in persuading their fellow parliamentarians that that was not a good idea, and it was simply eliminated. Then there is the problem of creation of crown corporations by ministers. Again, it was agreed to amend the bill to remove those provisions in certain pieces of existing legislation that allow a minister to create crown corporations. There were two exceptions, the Atlantic Fisheries Restructuring Act and the Canada Ports Corporation Act, both of which were recently adopted by Parliament. The former act allows the minister to acquire shares of existing fishery companies, and the Canada Ports Corporation Act allows the minister, on the request of the Canada Ports Corporation and with the approval of the Governor in Council, to create a local port corporation. It must name the harbours for which local ports may be established and it spells out the powers of the local ports corporations.

With regard to the boards of directors, it has always appeared to me that one of the important objectives of this bill was to make them, as distinct from the operating officers, more accountable and more active. Accordingly, this bill intends to have a strengthened role for the board of directors and to clearly set out how they and the senior officers would be appointed and held accountable for the conduct of the affairs of the corporation.

Under the proposed bill, as amended, the board of directors would be appointed by the appropriate minister with the approval of the Governor in Council. The chairman and chief executive officer would be appointed by the Governor in Council only after the board of directors have been consulted by the appropriate minister. Additionally, with regard to Canada Post Corporation, the act respecting that corporation will be amended so that vice-presidents as well will be appointed by the board of directors.

The bill has been further amended to provide that henceforth for all new parent crown corporations all officers appointed other than the chairman and chief executive officer would be made not by the minister but by the board of directors. Also, with respect to officers, the appropriate minister representing the sole shareholder would be responsible for the appointment and removal of all non-officer directors subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Furthermore, wording has been added to the bill to specify sanctions for wilful neglect of duties by corporation officers.

With respect to the question of ministers, questions have been asked about the role of ministers under Bill C-24. Accordingly, there was inserted in the bill a statement taken from the current Financial Administration Act stating that each crown corporation is ultimately accountable through the appropriate minister to Parliament for the conduct of the affairs of the corporation. That amendment responded particularly to a point raised by the Auditor General.

Another provision of the original bill which was felt to not sufficiently engage the attention of Parliament, was a provision that motions of concurrence not be necessary in respect of an order laid before the house which would move a corporation from Part I of Schedule C to Part II of Schedule C. The government agreed to an amendment which, in effect, reinstates the motion of concurrence and thereby reinstates or re-engages the activity and attention of Parliament.

Senator Roblin: What is the difference between the two parts of Schedule C?

Senator Frith: I have not studied the schedules as I ought to have. However, as I understand it the provisions of the Financial Administration Act and the manner of financing a crown corporation depend to a large extent on what schedule it is under.

The Auditor General also raised the criteria for scheduling the various crown corporations and, as a result, the bill as passed by the House of Commons was amended to state that crown corporations would be scheduled in Part II of Schedule C, only if in the opinion of the Governor in Council they operate in a manner generally independent of operating appropriations and in a competitive commercial environment. Also, a section was added which states that no corporation can be added to Part I or Part II unless, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, that corporation would not more appropriately be placed in Schedule B.

The Auditor General was concerned with other acts of Parliament which currently permit the creation of parent crown corporations without reference to Parliament. With the exception of the Atlantic Fisheries Restructuring Act and the Canada Ports Corporation Act, to which I have already made reference, the government has agreed that all existing statutes which permit the creation of parent crown corporations without reference to Parliament would be amended to remove that power.

A number of amendments to the bill respond to concerns expressed by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. For example, the government has deleted all provisions which would allow Treasury Board to authorize departures from the generally accepted accounting principles in the preparation of financial statements of crown corporations. The auditor of a crown corporation now would be granted qualified privilege similar to section 166 of the Canada Business Corporations Act. In this way, he or she will be protected from liability in respect of statements made fairly in the discharge of his or her duties, as is the case with regard to corporations under the Canada Business Corporations Act. The auditor's report would be addressed to the appropriate minister and would include separate opinions on both financial and non-financial information.

Honourable senators, throughout the consultative process which led to the final product which we see before us today, the government was pleased to see the firm desire and the co-operative spirit with which the official opposition and other members of the house approached the matter of amendment to see that much needed framework to control and render more accountable federal crown corporations was put in place. There was also a strong desire evident in some substantive way to the views of the Auditor General, the business community and others, in order to arrive at a bill with which all parties could feel satisfied. The hope is that the Canadian public will ultimately benefit from this stronger control and accountability regime.

Honourable senators, I perhaps should add an apology on behalf of the government for asking the Senate to pass this bill today at all stages given its complexities. My only justification is the attention it has received and the fact that all parties in the other place have supported it in its present form. In effect, what we are doing is acceding to a request from the other place to enable its work to have fruition today. There is no question but that this bill would otherwise require much more detailed study than I am asking it be given today. Therefore, I ask for support on second reading.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill C-24, the government's long awaited crown corporations bill. In my opinion, notwithstanding the fact that my party in the other place has supported it somewhat grudgingly, it is just one more bill which ought not to have made it to this chamber, particularly in this form. I do not think most of my colleagues even have a copy of it. I have the original bill and a bunch of amendments in my hand.

In previous speeches in this chamber—and I have not made that many—I have tried to reflect my commitment and belief in the role of the Senate chamber as the chamber of sober second thought. On that basis I have tried to speak as a concerned Canadian and I have studiously avoided partisanship. I have often wondered, however, on what sort of occasion I would find myself delivering a partisan speech. With this bill, I now have the answer. I wish to advertise in advance that this will be my first voyage into the area of making what I consider to be a somewhat partisan speech.

Senator Frith: But not the last!

Senator Kelly: Bill C-24 is here because the government knows that the public is weary of sloppy management and mismanagement. In its present form, Bill C-24 is still a considerable amount of smoke and mirrors. It is a sloppy and flawed piece of legislation hastily put together to fool the Canadian people into believing that this government is really serious about making crown corporations accountable and efficient. I am not fooled and I do not think the Canadian public will be fooled either by what I consider at this point to be a band-aid approach to responsible government. It will not stick and I would like to try to explain why.

My friends in the legal profession tell me there is a saying that American lawyers have to the effect that you cannot get good fruit from a poison tree. When you talk about crown corporations, "poison tree" becomes a poison orchard. The magnitude of the problem with crown corporations is staggering. Today, federal crown corporations employ over a quarter-of-a million people. There are over 450 crown corporations and mixed enterprises. Their asset value, as at March 31, 1984, is around $65 billion, excluding the Post Office Corporation and Canada Lands. The annual flow of funds involved budgetary appropriations of $3 billion; operating expenses flow through, $2.7 billion; a quarter of a billion dollars automatically in capital. These are big numbers. We must realize that the federal crown corporations sector is larger than Argus, Brascan, Canadian Pacific Investments, Cemp and Power Corporation combined. You can see, then, why it is an area that needs to be of some concern.

Crown corporations have become like lotteries: They just keep growing. Admittedly, the government does recognize that the crown corporation sector is out of control and perhaps C-24 goes a little way in the direction of correcting some of the problems, but it falls far short. In my opinion, C-24 does not tackle the two main issues in the crown corporation area—accountability and effective, efficient management.

Let me recount, in brief, the history of the exercise that has culminated in Bill C-24. Senators Pitfield and Kirby were deeply involved in most aspects of this exercise in their previous incarnations. Others of us might be surprised to know that the exercise began 14 years ago, in 1972, with a cabinet direction to the Privy Council Office to study the responsiveness of crown corporations to government policy. It continued through the Estey Commission of inquiry into Air Canada in 1975; the Auditor General's many observations and recommendations relating to crown corporations, beginning with his annual report to Parliament in 1976; the hearings of the Public Accounts Committee on AECL in 1977, on crown corporations generally in 1978 and on Polysar in 1978; the PCO's "blue book" on crown corporations published in 1977; the Lambert Royal Commission report in 1979; Bills C-153 and C-123 tabled in 1982; the Canadair and de Havilland problems and the Public Accounts Committee report on Canadair, and finally Bill C-24.

My point is this: With all of this time spent and all of these studies undertaken, why has the government waited until the dying days of this Parliament to bring forward crown corporations legislation? Why, having waited so long to table legislation, does the government push it through so quickly? Bill C-24 was tabled in the other place on March 15 and it has been pushed through by the government in three months. In my opinion, Bill C-24 in this form is a shining example of that old saying that haste makes waste. I was most interested in comments made by Senator Molson about the Bank Act. Why the haste? I am not sure that any of the senators, at least on this side of the chamber, are really competent at this point to make any comment whatsoever. Even the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Senator Roblin: I am in the same category on this bill. I do not know anything about it either.

Senator Kelly: We took three years to pass the Petro Canada Act. That was one crown corporation. We took two years to pass the Canagrex Act; that, too, was one corporation. It took a year for the passage of the revised Air Canada Act in 1977, but C-24, which covers all crown corporations, this lengthy, technically complex bill, is forced through by the government in three months. I ask again, why the haste?

The government was so eager to push this legislation through that it said yes to amendments offered by my party in the other place. In fact, it said yes to more than 50 per cent of over 100 amendments that were being offered. Here is the result. These are amendments that emerged through discussion and argument but the mood of the forum in which these arguments were taking place was "Look, just tell us what you would like and we will put it in." Process, clearly, was the objective; "Let's get our bill through. Whatever you want in it, just tell us and we will put it in." No fuss, no arguments.

Honourable senators, at this point Bill C-24 is just a collection of several documents. It is a hodge-podge of words on paper. The government gobbled up our suggestions without any real interest in policy or consistency; just process. There are many thoughtful amendments. In fact, I have to be partisan and suggest that most of the amendments that were accepted were from our party, and they are probably the only credible parts of the bill.

My comments are not idle reflections. They are the result of over four months of careful scrutiny of federal crown corporations. I was privileged to serve as co-chairman of the Conservative Task Force on Crown Corporations. I was given this privilege because at least my personal experience with this sector has provided me with insight and a better understanding of the woes afflicting public enterprise. Again, I do not know how many of my colleagues on this side have even handled this document, let alone read it.

I believe that the process by which Bill C-24 has been prepared is irrevocably sullied. That alone should cause us to look with suspicion on this bill. I am sure that my honourable colleagues are familiar with some of the nonsense that the government resorted to in order to get this bill to this chamber today. The government applied pressure on crown corporations, particularly cultural corporations, to keep quiet and not to appear before a parliamentary committee. They were told to "take a dive on Bill C-24". That is a matter of record in the committee of the other place.

What have we come to in this country if the government uses its power to stifle and suppress legitimate concerns about, and opposition to, some of its own initiatives? How, as parliamentarians, should we react to an executive that intimidates witnesses before a parliamentary committee? Obviously, such a tree cannot bear good fruit.

Still, my two major concerns are accountability and effective and efficient management. How does the government tackle accountability? It does not; it bypasses it. Instead, the approach recommended involves bureaucratic tangles and processes that only a good public servant can unravel.

That brings me to another point. There is an interesting development in the crown corporations sector and that is the fact that public servants are popping up all over in key positions. The CNR is headed by the former secretary to the Treasury Board; the Export Development Corporation is headed by the former Deputy Minister of Transport; the Federal Business Development Bank is headed by a former Assistant Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce; Petro-Canada; CDIC—we could go on and on. I am sure that these people are all very bright and capable, but that is not my point. My point is that the escalating bureaucratization of crown corporations, as epitomized in Bill C-24, is contrary to one of the reasons for setting up crown corporations in the first place. We should all agree that if crown corporations are to be effective, they must have some independence. They should be exposed to market discipline. Let us set standards of performance and hold them to it; let us clearly specify their mandates and allow experienced managers to get on with the job. I am sure that we all want accountability: Accountability through a minister to Parliament; accountability through corporate plans, so we know where the directions are and if they are appropriate.

The amendments offered by my party redressed some of these problems. I think we are all agreed that effective and efficient management can be greatly assisted by good boards of directors. There is a great deal of talent in the private sector that could serve crown corporations well. However, I do not think we are tapping that resource as thoroughly as we should. I am certain that we are still not laying the groundwork for assigning their responsibility and their mandate as effective members of a board that must direct the activities of a multibillion-dollar enterprise.

At this moment, Bill C-24 hinders many of these things with more bureaucratic intervention. It paves the way for boards still to be short-circuited, ignored and reduced to almost ceremonial bodies. Who would want to serve on that kind of board? I wish that Senator Sinclair or Senator Kolber were here. Certainly, Senator Roblin, I know, would have a quick answer to that question because of his own corporate experience.

There are ways to make crown corporations perform better and to serve their shareholders, the people of Canada, better. I do not think that Bill C-24 demonstrates that the government has yet figured out these ways. There is also the question of how one piece of legislation can effectively regulate such a huge and diverse range of entities. The answer is that it cannot. A number of corporations have already been exempted from Bill C-24. At many points in the bill there are provisions to exempt other corporations from certain clauses. In addition, there are more than 20 clauses in Bill C-24 that provide extensive regulation-making powers to the government to adapt the requirements of Bill C-24 to the circumstances of each corporation or group of corporations. In essence, Bill C-24 is but a framework, an amalgam of principles and guidelines. The real meat of the legislation is in the regulations, and they can be changed at the whim of the government of the day with little or no scrutiny or control by Parliament. Surely this is not right. Surely it is not feasible to try to lump the Canadian Battlefields Commission, with annual expenditures of $1.5 million, with a huge multinational such as the CNR. They have been creating crown corporations willy-nilly. Since 1968, on average, there has been one new federal crown corporation created every three months.

The government should have been more careful in resorting to the crown corporation form. Proliferation certainly has devalued the currency of the crown corporation form, and has largely made omnibus legislation such as Bill C-24 impractical. What needs to be done is to reorganize the crown corporation sector to reduce it to those activities that truly require corporate form for one reason or another. Then, and only then, will legislation such as Bill C-24 have a chance of being effective.

In closing, let me say that this government and the party it represents has got to learn that Canadians want good government not just lots of government. A change at the helm of their organization is not necessarily going to be any more effective in wrestling with the blight that has ravaged this government. The crown corporations sector is only a sample of the devastating effect of that disease. What Canadians deserve, and what this country needs, what the crown corporations demand, is clear, well thought-out policies and direction. If Bill C-24 is the best this government can do after 14 or so years of studying the problem, then the people of Canada, not just me, have a message to relay: Let's get serious about good government.

I am a concerned Canadian who happens to be a member of the Progressive Conservative Party. I have a few suggestions that deserve consideration. We all deserve time and input into the parliamentary system if the process is going to mean anything and if we are going to get things back on track.

One of my colleagues referred to this bill as a "dog's breakfast". Perhaps it is better than nothing. That appears to have been the view of my party when this legislation was being debated in the other place. Better than nothing, perhaps, but not much.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to receive some instructions from my colleagues with respect to this particular piece of legislation. It could very well be the responsibility of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to study this legislation. I am afraid that at this point in the parliamentary calendar I do not think it would be very complimentary to the committee to refer a bill of this magnitude to it and ask that it be considered and reported back to the Senate in time to meet the deadline that the government appears to have set. We do not even have a copy of the printed version of the amended bill.

Last evening I glanced through the Votes and Proceedings of the other place and counted approximately 150 amendments which are not in the copy of the bill that I have. So I really don't know where to start. We can certainly arrange for the members of the committee to meet sometime this afternoon, and we can sit around for an hour or so and drink coffee and then report the bill back without amendment. It seems to me that if the House of Commons can find 150 amendments in one evening, surely the Senate would be able to find a few amendments during an afternoon. But what would happen with the token amendments we would move in committee? They would be defeated and the bill would be passed as we have received it, in bits and pieces.

Senator Kelly showed us a stack of paper this morning that no Senate committee or any self-respecting organization should be expected to consider on such short notice. Obviously, if the bill is referred to the committee, the committee will consider the bill, but I would not consider it to be a great compliment to the committee system to see it degraded to that level.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for the reasons I expressed in my speech in support of the bill, and for the reasons expressed by Senator Doody, I do not intend to ask that this bill be referred to committee. I agree with his analysis and I further agree, as I think I made clear in my speech in support of the bill, that it is and ought to be unusual to ask the Senate to approve a bill of this kind, except on the basis I mentioned.

I have only one comment to make regarding Senator Kelly's intervention. When he said that it is the government that is asking for this legislation to be passed today—and that is true, it is the government that is asking that the legislation be passed—in a sense that is a bit of bum rap because that is not what I am asking the Senate to do; I am asking the Senate to have faith not only in the government in passing this but to have faith in all parties in the House of Commons—which may be worse. What else can I say? That is exactly what I am asking the Senate to do. I am asking that the Senate accept the co-operative work done by the members of the other place, and bearing in mind the fact that all parties in the other place supported the bill in its present form, not as a perfect bill but as a bill that ought to be passed before we adjourn.

Senator Doody: What you are saying is that we do not need a Senate.

Senator Roblin: That is the best argument for abolition.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Frith: I am saying that it is and ought to be unusual to ask the Senate to do this. I say that we certainly do need a Senate. I am saying that it is and ought to be exceptional to ask the Senate to approve a bill of such complexity. I cannot put it on a higher basis.

I have nothing further to add except to ask honourable senators to support second reading of the bill for the reasons I have stated.

Motion agreed to and bill read a second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

BILL TO GRANT ACCESS TO RECORDS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE— SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-252, to grant access to records of the Special Committee on the Defence of Canada Regulations.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-252 is a private member's public bill. The object of the bill, as set out in the explanatory note, is as follows:

During the Second World War a Special Committee on the Defence of Canada Regulations sat in camera and limited the distribution of its minutes and evidence to its members. The purpose of this Bill is to authorize the release of all the records of that committee which are still classified.

The background, honourable senators, is that an historian was doing some research on the history of the Jehovah's Witnesses in Canada during the Second World War. He learned about this committee and felt there was relevant material held by it. After consulting with some of his colleagues who were also historians, he corresponded with the Honourable John Reid of the other place and one of his colleagues from the Progressive Conservative Party. The Honourable John Reid is an historian, and perhaps his Conservative colleague is also, I am not sure. In any event, they both agreed, as did other Canadian historians, that it would be useful to have this material available and, therefore, introduced this private bill. I think it received unanimous approval on the other side. It seems to me from reading the correspondence and examining the objectives of the bill, that it ought to be passed here today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I assume the records were examined and nothing was found in them that would create a danger to Canada if they were made public.

Senator Frith: I am looking closely through my briefing notes and there is nothing to support that conclusion.

Senator Flynn: It beats the silence of the government in the other place.

Senator Frith: If Senator Flynn is inviting me to make the inference that I think he is making, I would rather refuse the invitation. I will not quarrel with the fact that he is making it and there might be some basis for it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Senator Flynn has the right to do that, but he has to take the responsibility for it himself.

Senator Flynn: What I am saying is that if these documents were classified and now we are going to declassify them, my understanding is that the government must have checked that there was no danger in doing that. I have to assume that from the silence of the members of the government in the other place.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I misunderstood. Senator Flynn is saying, in effect, that we have not had the opportunity to study the bill and it is not unreasonable to assume that if there were any danger to Canada resulting from the release of this information someone would have spoken up on behalf of the government. I think that is a reasonable inference.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b) moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE EXAMINATION OF ONGOING EFFECTS OF RESTRUCTURING ON FISHING INDUSTRY—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the ongoing effects of the restructuring of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the background to this motion, as honourable senators may remember, is that there was a proposal which I had discussed with the opposition, with the committee, and, in particular with Senator Marshall, about the possibility of having a special committee study that subject. Senator Marshall and some of his colleagues on the other side, and some of our colleagues, felt that we had to stop this proliferation of special committees. Senator Marshall pointed out that it was within the mandate of the standing committee and, therefore, ought to be referred to them.

I apologize to Senator Marshall and to the Senate that I was unable to get my act together on the question of which committee should handle it and whether the government wanted to proceed with the study either on the basis of a special committee or a standing committee. As a result, it has stood on the Order Paper. Subsequently, I had a meeting with Senator Marshall and I agreed that I would apologize for not dealing with that order earlier. We now agree under those circumstances that there would be little point in dealing with it at this stage of our sitting, and therefore, we will perhaps reinstate it at a future date. Can we consider it debated?

Hon. Jack Marshall: I hope that we will reactivate it in the new session under one government or the other.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If it is a motion you should suggest it be withdrawn. If we wished to consider it as having been debated it would mean the Speaker would have to put the question.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn is quite right. It would have to be withdrawn with consent, if that is satisfactory.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we understand that the House of Commons will be asking us to pass some non-controversial—we hope—bills this afternoon before Royal Assent. Their Question Period was held from 11 a.m. until noon which means that they have been working for less than an hour. The discussions I had with those on the other side indicated that they would try not to work past 2 o'clock, and that they would be content with whatever bills they were able to deal with by that time. For that reason I think we should adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 2 p.m. I will check on the situation in the other place before the ringing of the bells.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL CHARLES ASKWITH, C.D., ACTING GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD—FELICITATIONS ON RETIREMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since we are not absolutely sure what is going to unfold in the next little while, I should like to take this opportunity to draw to your attention the fact that today is the last day in the Senate for the Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Askwith has been with us for many years as the Deputy Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod and, more recently, as the Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Colonel Askwith has always done a superb job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I think all of us were particularly impressed with the proceedings at the opening of Parliament last December, which he, as we all know, organized in such a brief period of time.

His presence here will be missed by all honourable senators as well as by the Senate staff. Therefore, on behalf of the government, I would like to offer Colonel Askwith our very best wishes for his retirement and our gratitude for a job well done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of my leader and those of us who sit on this side of the chamber, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government in expressing our sentiments, appreciation and good wishes to Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Askwith on this occasion.

I hope he will not mind my saying that he is a quiet and unassuming man, but he is also a very efficient and friendly man. Those qualities certainly adorn the manner with which he has graced his office as the Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod in this chamber.

We will miss him; we are sorry to see him go, but he goes with our warm thanks for the way in which he has conducted the important business of his office.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I too should like to express my gratitude to Lieutenant-Colonel Askwith, who has been most helpful to me in carrying out the duties of my office.

[Senator Frith.]

When I was appointed, Colonel Askwith was ill. He invited me to visit him at his home and, even while on medication, his devotion to his function beyond the call of duty impressed me. He has always displayed the utmost dedication in supplying information and assisting the Office of the Speaker.

[Translation]

I may add that Colonel Askwith's services go well beyond those I have just mentioned. He has an intimate knowledge of Parliament Hill, in addition to his military experience. Furthermore, he is able to converse, in excellent French I may add, with everyone we meet in Parliament.

I wish to express my sincere gratitude for the invaluable services he has rendered to the Speaker of the Senate.

Personally, I am sad to see him go, and I hope there will be a way to impart his qualities to the person destined to be the next Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and that he will be able to perform his duties with the same dignity, discretion and skill as Lieutenant Colonel Askwith.

MINGAN ARCHIPELAGO NATIONAL PARK BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-53, an Act to establish a National Park on the Mingan Archipelago.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

SECOND READING

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-53 was adopted unanimously in the other place. The purpose of this bill is to reserve lands for the Mingan Archipelago National Park.

In the course of nearly a century, 29 national parks and more than 75 historic parks, sites and canals have been created and developed in all Canada's regions. Continuing in this vein, the bill proposes to create a national park in the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the Mingan Archipelago, about 200 kilometers east of Sept-Îles. The site was chosen because of its unique characteristics. The Mingan Archipelago is truly remarkable and deserves to be protected for future generations.

The Mingan islands have attracted considerable attention during the last twenty years because of the unique character of this natural region and the wealth and diversity of its ecosystems which are still in their virgin state.

The unique character of the Mingan Archipelago is due to the presence and impact of a number of natural phenomena that are extremely interdependent. The marine and sub-boreal climate, combined with the many geological shifts in its rock formations, has helped to create a terrain that is exceptionally beautiful and diversified. Its vegetation, in many cases unique, is particularly well adapted to the environment. Also typical are the many bird colonies and a marine environment where several whale species, including the great blue whale, may be seen quite regularly.

The Mingan Islands are a representative and exceptional example of one of the numerous natural regions of Canada. Their land and marine environment contain all the characteristic natural components, at both the national and world-wide level, which make them an ideal site for one of Canada's most beautiful national parks. How will Parks Canada manage to turn that territory into a leisure and educational area, while at the same time protecting the historical and natural resources which made it worthwhile to select it as a national park?

First of all, the Natural Parks Act will guarantee that protection, since it covers all activities on and uses of those territories. Second, the policy of Parks Canada is to set the general principles to be followed to make sure that the development of lands under Parks Canada responsibility will be in keeping with its mandate to protect our natural or cultural heritage. Finally, in the past decades, in light of scientific and technological advance, Parks Canada has set up various land planning and management mechanisms so that they will be developed and used in a rational manner which is compatible with its basic protective mission.

The Mingan Archipelago is in a territory which is the subject of land claims on the part of the Attikamek-Montagnais Council. The Mingan Band has already endorsed the principle of this bill. The establishment of a park reserve guarantees that the national park will not become reality until the claims of the native people have been settled. Any right, title or interest of the native people which is part of a claim will be acknowledged within the limits of the national park.

The Mingan Archipelago will be the 30th national park, a jewel in our network of national parks which are already internationally famous.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the idea of creating a National Park on the Mingan Archipelago is certainly an excellent one.

I know that the federal authorities have beaten the officials of the Quebec government in their negotiations with the native band involved to obtain its agreement for the transfer of this territory to create the park.

We shall have to find out eventually how this park can serve the general public since it is in a relatively remote area. It will therefore not be easy to reach except if excursions are organized from Sept-Îles. As mentioned by Senator Giguère, this park is situated 200 miles east of Sept-Îles. Undoubtedly, the natural beauty of the site as well as its fauna and flora should eventually attract many tourists.

This is the territory described by Gilles Vigneault in his song "Jack Monoloy" when he refers to the birch-trees of the Mingan River. Many of you may have seen on television how these islands, which present the most incredible shapes, can create a very special impression.

All we can hope is that the project will be implemented as the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs now intends it to be. For this reason, we agree that this bill should receive second reading immediately.

I do not see any need to refer the bill to a committee; it can receive third reading later on.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM CIVIL AND COMMERCIAL JUDGMENTS CONVENTION BILL, 1984

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-51, to implement a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland providing for the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be now read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, the convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland providing for the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters was signed in Ottawa on April 24 of this year. This convention codifies the existing principles for the recognition of judgments in Canada and the United Kingdom and also simplifies the procedures in this area. The bill that is before us today extends the application of the convention to judgments rendered by the Federal Court.

The main reason for concluding this convention was the imminent accession by the United Kingdom to a European convention on the enforcement of judgments. This European convention provides for the enforcement of judgments of other European states, including some that would not otherwise have been recognized by the United Kingdom courts because of their being based on challengeable—frequently qualified as “exorbitant”—bases of jurisdiction.

The European convention, however, contains a provision which enables the United Kingdom to declare that it will not recognize or enforce any judgment based on exorbitant grounds of jurisdiction given against a party that is domiciled or habitually resident in a specified non-European state. By article IX of the proposed Canada-United Kingdom convention, which is attached to the bill as a schedule, the United Kingdom undertakes to make such a declaration.

Before Canada can ratify this convention, both federal and provincial legislation has to be adopted. Almost all of the provinces have undertaken to adopt the necessary bill, and I can advise honourable senators that this has already been done in Ontario and my own province of Nova Scotia. Article XII of the proposed convention enables Canada to ratify and expand the application of the convention to specific provinces, not necessarily to all of the provinces.

Since it is expected that the European convention will come into force in January 1985, the passage of this bill will ensure that Canadian assets in the United Kingdom will be protected against claims and judgments which, but for the European convention, would not be recognized in the United Kingdom.

Honourable senators, the explanation is somewhat more complicated than I had thought when I first read the bill, and I was tempted to commence my remarks by saying that it was a simple bill. But I recalled, of course, the fate of a senator, unfortunately now no longer with us, who commenced a motion for second reading with that statement, and therefore I refrained from doing so. Then, when I read the notes setting out the reason for the implementation of this convention, I realized that it was not that simple after all. Nevertheless, with that explanation, I commend the bill to honourable senators and seek their support on second reading.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I concur with the last statement of the sponsor of the bill that this legislation is more complicated than at first glance it may appear. Normally the procedure for enforcing a judgment of a foreign country or another province is called exemplification, which, in fact, means a repetition of the previous trial, to enable a new judgment to be rendered by the court where the execution of the judgment is required to take place. Apparently this convention would merely provide for the registration of the judgment in a court and a retrial would not be necessary. That is how I saw the situation at first glance. However, I note also that this convention does not apply to many kinds of judgments. Article II in Part II of the bill, under the heading “Scope of the Convention”, says:

2. This Convention shall not apply to

(a) orders for the periodic payment of maintenance;

And we are aware of the problem between provinces regarding the execution of orders for maintenance:

[Senator Hicks.]

(b) the recovery of taxes, duties or charges of a like nature or the recovery of a fine or penalty;

(c) judgments given on appeal from decisions of tribunals other than courts;

(d) judgments which determine

(i) the status or legal capacity of natural persons;

(ii) custody or guardianship of infants;

(iii) matrimonial matters;

(iv) succession to or the administration of the estates of deceased persons;

(v) bankruptcy, insolvency or the winding up of companies or other legal persons;

(vi) the management of the affairs of a person not capable of managing his own affairs.

All of those classes of judgments are excluded from the application of the convention. Therefore I would say the legislation is restricted. As Senator Hicks has indicated, it requires complementary legislation by each province with regard to the courts in both civil and commercial matters. The convention has been negotiated for some time, and, for the reasons indicated by Senator Hicks, I see no problem in passing this bill today. As the legislation requires the concurrence of the provincial authorities, I am quite sure that we shall not be taking any risk in passing this bill.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hicks speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hicks: I thank the honourable senator for his perceptive intervention. I too was struck by the many exclusions from the types and classes of judgments that are dealt with by this convention, but I rationalized the situation by considering that it was better than nothing. I believe this to be a step in a direction which I am sure most of us will agree is the right one. Therefore I hope that honourable senators will support the bill on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, this is the type of legislation about which I believe a Senate committee could not do very much. Accordingly, I do not believe there is any point in referring it to committee. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-54, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Peter Bosa: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, on a point of order, a great deal of study and work has been undertaken by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. We have a pretty full schedule today and if we could take a few minutes to consider that report—it is Order No. 5—it would relieve a lot of us of the tension of having to sit and wait for a chance to get the report before our peers to see whether or not they accept it.

● (1430)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe that the report is on the Order Paper for approval but, rather, for consideration. I spoke to Senator Langlois, and I should have mentioned it to Senator Riley, and told him that since legislation normally takes precedence, we agreed we would proceed with the legislation and as soon as we get a chance we will deal with that report.

Senator Riley: The honourable senator says that legislation takes precedence. Here is something that members on both sides of the Senate have worked hard on for a number of months. Are we just going to wait for prorogation and walk away from this work over which we laboured for so long?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was not suggesting that. I guess Senator Riley did not hear what I had to say.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, the proposed bill amends the Public Service Superannuation Act, which provides for pension benefits for federal public servants. The amendments are designed to remedy the past and future superannuation status of employees of members of Parliament. The amendment applies also to the employees of the Speakers' offices of both houses, government leaders of both houses and leaders of the opposition of both houses and the staff of the official residence and other similar employees. The bill provides as well that coverage will be extended to all present and future employees of members of Parliament and other categories named by regulation from the date the bill comes into force.

This amendment is necessitated by the fact that it was believed that the act covered these categories of employees that I have mentioned but, upon examination by law officers of the Crown, it was discovered that it did not. These amendments fulfil that objective.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The explanation is so clear that I cannot find anything to add.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bosa moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF INTERIM REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications entitled: "Interim Report—Rail Passenger Services in Canada—Are We on the Right Track?", tabled in the Senate on 26th June, 1984—(Honourable Senator Macdonald.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Riley has pointed out that there are senators who wish to speak to this order. Perhaps we could have it called. It stands in the name of Senator Macdonald.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have no objection but I would like to know whether we are going to receive other bills from the House of Commons. It seems to me that at 2.45 p.m. we should not be expecting to deal with other legislation today.

Senator Frith: I agree. However, I cannot be over there and here at the same time.

Senator Flynn: Usually, when it is necessary, it seems that your lines of communication are well established.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, even though our time today is somewhat limited, I would not want the Senate to adjourn without making some reference to the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which is entitled "Are We on the Right Track?" This is a report of a study into the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada. It is not my intention to speak at any length on the contents of the report but I would like to draw your attention to page two, where, under the heading "Should VIA Rail Exist?" It reads:

The title of this report is not intended to be facetious. It reflects the Committee's concern about the future of passenger rail transport in Canada. An atmosphere of uncertainty has been created in many regions of Canada that perhaps there really is no future for this type of transportation system. The long history of poorer and poorer passenger service and the service cutbacks announced by the Government in 1981 caused this uncertainty and put the future of passenger rail transportation in doubt.

Recent problems, especially during the Christmas period in December 1983 with equipment breakdowns resulting in long delays, have been viewed as indications that VIA Rail still is not committed to providing an adequate rail service. The Committee believes that underlying the whole issue of passenger rail transportation is the question of whether or not the Government is committed to the existence of VIA Rail, or even to passenger rail services. As stated in its first interim report, the Committee is still of the opinion that a modern and efficient railway passenger system can and should be provided and continue to play an important role in Canada's transportation future.

Are we "on the right track" to the achievement of this goal? The Committee believes that some advances have been made in a positive direction but that much more needs to be done. It feels that with proper Government initiatives, sound management practices and necessary powers, VIA Rail Canada Inc. can provide Canadians with a good rail passenger system.

Honourable senators, the report makes 26 recommendations which, if carried out, would provide Canadians with a good, modern passenger service.

I know that the committee would not expect all of its recommendations to be carried out at once, but a commitment to carry them out would be very helpful. Indeed, I hope that recommendations 1 and 2 will be accepted and put into effect as soon as possible in the next sitting of Parliament. These are two essential recommendations and I would like to take the time to quote them. Recommendation 1 reads as follows:

1. The Committee recommends that legislation be enacted by the Parliament of Canada at the earliest possible time to establish VIA Rail on its own statutory basis with a mandate to provide a sound and efficient national rail passenger system.

Recommendation 2 reads as follows:

2. The Committee recommends that the Act include a clear statement of the Government's policy regarding VIA's provision of rail passenger service.

Honourable senators, if these two recommendations were put into effect it would be a very good thing. Since I am a member of the committee which made these recommendations and since I participated in some of the hearings, I suppose it would not do for me to praise the report too highly. However, I do think it is worthy of praise. It is a valuable report and I think it

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: He presided over the hearings of the committee with ability, knowledge, skill, and even with patience. We are fortunate in that he was our chairman. I know he will continue to act as chairman while the committee continues its study and he will give us the benefit of his knowledge and his wise guidance. Honourable senators, I am pleased to support the motion for the adoption of this report if such a motion should be made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate on this report. However, as I said earlier, the members of the committee, representing all regions of Canada, took the terms of reference seriously. We worked hard on studying and reviewing the VIA Rail situation and we came up with our recommendations. Along with Senator Macdonald, I hope that the government will implement them, particularly the most important ones. I can only recommend to my peers that this report be adopted.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, the debate on the consideration of this report is considered as being concluded.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would now like to outline the state of play as best I can figure it out. The bills which are left to be dealt with are Bill C-31, which is legislation respecting fresh water fish; Bill C-47, which deals with amendments to the Indian Act; Bill C-50, which deals with agricultural stabilization; and Bill C-56, which deals with farm products.

As I see it, we are left with some four bills. However, the other place is bogged down with respect to Bill C-47. I think that very shortly we should tell them in the other place that they had better complete what they want completed and not expect any more help from us if they cannot get to the legislation I have outlined. Obviously, Bill C-47 does not now fit into the category of what I described previously as non-controversial; if it were then we should have it. I believe the other bills are in that category. Therefore, I would ask the Senate to allow me a few moments, until approximately 3.30 p.m., to make inquiries at which time I will return with a report as to the status of these bills.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before we adjourn perhaps we could take care of Order No. 6 on the Order Paper. It stands in my name and I would like to deal with it.

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, tabled in the Senate on 20th June, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald.)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I must confess I did not follow closely the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources which reviewed the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, which report was entitled "Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum". However, I must also confess that I was impressed by the speech delivered in the Senate on June 20 last by Senator Hastings, who is chairman of the committee.

That report was a review of the public and governmental responses to the 21 recommendations contained in the report of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline, which was tabled in the Senate on March 30, 1983. It must be most gratifying to the members of the special committee that 17 of the recommendations were accepted and the remaining four were not rejected out of hand but, rather, required further study.

I found one part of Senator Hastings' speech especially informative. He mentioned that the committee provided a clear momentum and initiative for three important federal government programs in the north. The first is known as Northern Regulatory Review; the second is the Northern Oil and Gas Action Program; and the third is the Northern Land Use Planning Program. If honourable senators wish details of these programs I refer them to the two reports.

It should be noted these programs have been initiated at the prompting and with the concurrence of the special committee. I feel Senator Hastings and his committee deserve the thanks and commendation of the Senate for their valuable report and for the follow-up they made to determine what had been the response of the government.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to speak, the debate on this order is considered to be concluded.

MARITIME DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canada's Maritime Defence", tabled in the Senate on 15th June, 1983.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald.)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs dealing with maritime defence is the second report of its Subcommittee on National Defence. The first report dealt with manpower in Canada's armed forces, and there is to be a third report dealing with air power. These reports are very interesting and they are valuable documents. They represent a detached, factual, non-emotional, in-depth study of our national defence. The conclusions reached and the recommendations made are worthy of, and entitled to, favourable consideration.

The present report deals with Canada's maritime defence. To see the quality of the study, as it were, one only has to look at Appendix E. This is a list of the people who appeared as witnesses before the subcommittee. It shows 100 persons gave evidence, 18 of whom appeared more than once. The list of witnesses is an impressive one. It is composed of service and non-service people who are experts in their fields and whose knowledge and ability, I am sure, greatly impressed the members of the subcommittee.

Honourable senators, I expect this report on our maritime defence is of special interest to those of us who come from the eastern and western coasts of Canada. I know it is of special interest to those from the east coast who remember the state of our navy when Canada went to war in 1939. You will remember, too, the frantic efforts which were made to increase our naval strength, and to build and strengthen our coastal defences. The report mentions that in 1939 our regular navy consisted of six destroyers and 2,100 uniformed personnel, and these were divided between the east and the west coast. It is of interest to know that during the war the navy expanded rapidly and in 1945 consisted of 211 ships of various types and 94,000 uniformed personnel.

During that war our navy did many heroic deeds and not only made a substantial contribution to our final victory, but also proved that the Canadian navy and its sailors were at least as good as those of any other country in the world.

Honourable senators, if I might digress for a moment, I would like to say that I have a special interest in the navy, coming, as I do, from the east coast. As you get older, you remember things that happened long ago. I remember the time when the unit I was with went into France. We were what was called army troops; we moved when army headquarters moved and we did not go to France until practically the end of July. However, we wandered around the Channel for a while and spent the night waiting to disembark. There was some bombing during that time and, in the morning when we went up on deck of the ship we were on, I saw alongside the port side of that ship, approximately 600 yards away, a big, powerful low-slung cruiser and I tell you, it was a very reassuring sight.

Conditions have changed since 1949 and such a rapid expansion of our naval forces is no longer possible. The modern navy ship is a very sophisticated piece of equipment whose design and construction requires a long period of time. It requires highly trained personnel to operate it, experts in electronics, mathematics and physics, computer sciences and engineering.

The report found that the Canadian navy is sufficient in many ways, and sets out in detail just what it considers is the minimum necessary to put our navy in a position so that it can fulfill its duties both at home and our commitments to our NATO allies. Just what these duties are are found at page 27 of the report, and I quote:

In the 1971 white paper on defence, Defence in the 70s, the commitments of the Canadian Armed Forces were listed as the protection of Canadian sovereignty; the defence of North America; contributing to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; and peacekeeping. In the twelve years since the defence white paper was published, nothing has happened to render any of these general commitments inappropriate. Indeed, nothing indicates that Canada may soon be able to abandon any of them.

Then the paper entitled Background Information Canadian Frigate Project uses much the same language in defining the role of the navy. It states, and again I quote:

Canada needs to be prepared both to protect its own sovereignty and maritime jurisdiction and to participate with the allies in a collective deterrent effort. As a country with one of the longest coastlines in the world, Canada requires a viable naval force able to do both.

It also states that a fleet of 24 vessels had been accepted as the requirement to meet Canada's commitment to collective defence, and in the report it is mentioned that 20 destroyers would be required along with support ships.

It was at that time in December 1977 that the decision was announced to acquire six frigates as the first part of a long-term future replacement program for the navy. As you know, contracts have been awarded for the construction of these frigates and I understand work on them is to start this year. Honourable senators, the cost of these ships indicates in no uncertain manner what the cost would be of modernizing our navy by replacing old ships with new, modern ships and perhaps converting others, along with normal refits. The cost of the six new frigates at ceiling price is estimated to be $3.85 billion in 1983 dollars, and the estimated cost of modernizing four destroyers is $650 million, and I believe that tenders have been called for the modernization of those destroyers.

Honourable senators, to emphasize the objectives of our defence policy, I quote from the address of the Honourable H. A. Olson, P.C., the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which is found in the appendix to the Debates of the Senate of April 12 last.

We, as members of a collective defence alliance, must make sure that we convey to those who might breach the peace that such a course of action would not be worthwhile because we have both the means and the determination to safeguard our security interests. In order to do so, while we continue to pursue with our allies the objective of greater security through arms control negotiations, we must make a tangible contribution to the development of new weapons systems to counter those that have been deployed against us, and we must maintain our agreed levels of commitment to collective defence. Our expressions of solidarity must be backed by material evidence of our determination to meet our agreed defence commitments.

Honourable senators, I would like to offer one more quotation just to illustrate the point that there does not appear to be any difference between government objectives and the objectives of the subcommittee in regard to national defence. I quote from the National Defence Department Report dated March 1984 and entitled Defence '83, where the role of the Canadian forces is defined. It says:

The Canadian Forces are the military element of the Canadian Government and are part of DND. Government Policy concerning the CF takes into account national and foreign policy. The roles of the CF are developed within this framework. They are:

The surveillance of our own territory and coast lines, i.e. the protection of our sovereignty.

The defence of North America in cooperation with the U.S. Forces.

The fulfillment of such NATO commitments as may be agreed upon.

The performance of such international peacekeeping roles as we may from time to time assume.

Honourable senators, since there is general agreement as to the purpose and role of our defence forces, one may well ask why the report of the subcommittee is so critical of the present state of the navy—and it is critical. I suppose the short answer is that the subcommittee is of the opinion that the navy is unable to fulfill the role required of it. Indeed, in the very first paragraph of the introduction it states that our maritime defences have so far deteriorated that immediate and drastic remedies are called for. It further states that while Canada's maritime claims have been increasing, the ability to defend them has been declining. The subcommittee is of the opinion from the testimony that it received and from personal observation that with the equipment it now has, maritime command cannot meet its commitment for the protection of Canadian sovereignty or the other obligations we have assumed.

This is a very serious allegation. Yet without going into the matter in detail, I think it must be admitted that the subcommittee has made a very powerful case to support its finding and conclusions. Indeed, I think it has shown that since 1945 we have allowed our naval forces to be neglected. We did not provide our navy with the modern ships and equipment it needed to carry out the task assigned to it.

I do not think that anyone can be blamed for this state of affairs. The country was in no mood for spending large sums of money for naval construction. There was certainly no surge of public opinion demanding that our navy be given modern ships and equipment. Indeed, I do not think the public in general knew or cared too much about fulfilling our naval obligations. I suppose the reason for this attitude was that, up to the time of the Second World War, we knew that the British Navy was there in case of need and, since 1945, we have had the comforting feeling that the U.S. Navy was not far away. Actually, anyone who had some knowledge of the matter and gave it some thought could only marvel that our navy could be kept in such a high state of efficiency as it is, working under such adverse conditions.

Honourable senators, I think it was in 1974 that it was decided that over a period of years the navy would be given new ships and modern equipment. To pay for the modernization program, there would be an annual increase of three per cent in defence spending. Yet, as shown in the report, a much larger expenditure would be necessary if the navy were to be brought up to the standard the committee recommends. To bring the navy up to that standard, the committee made 32 recommendations. The first 12 of these could be accomplished with little, if any, extra cost. For example, the first recommendation is that work should begin immediately on a white paper which would clearly state Canada's defence policy and priorities and describe the tasks the government expects the armed forces to perform. However, honourable senators, other recommendations—the major recommendations—would be very costly and require a large annual sum of money regardless of how long the period was over which it was spread out. The committee set out what it considered a desirable naval force and estimated its cost. Accordingly, the committee felt the primary aim of Canadian maritime defence policy should be the creation of a renewed, balanced fleet within 12 years. The policy should take into account both the need for approximately twice as many major weapons platforms as MARCOM now possesses and the need to compensate as rapidly as possible for current deficiencies. The subcommittee suggested that an extra $550 million a year for 12 years in constant 1983 dollars would be used to acquire capital equipment, and this would be in addition to the normal defence expenditures. There would also be at least an additional $80 million a year required to man and operate the new fleet. In the government's reply to the report, as outlined in Senator Olson's address, printed as an appendix to Senate Hansard of April 12, many of the recommendations are accepted, but it is felt the committee's estimate of cost is low. Indeed, the government estimates the costs involved would be much higher, and I think that has been proven.

I also look at a reply given by the Minister of National Defence to a question asked in the House of Commons on May 24. The minister stated that in 1974-75 the government spent $2.5 billion in defence expenditures, and of this about 8 per cent was for capital expenditures. This year the expenditure will be $8.7 billion, and of this 26 per cent will be capital expenditure. It is estimated that in 1986-87 the sum of $11.1 billion will be spent.

Honourable senators, the subcommittee realized that acceptance of their recommendations would be costly. Indeed, it mentioned it had already recommended in its first report the expenditure of an additional $350 million a year, and in all probability there would be a substantial increase recommended in its third report. So, honourable senators, while the recommendations of the subcommittee are worthy of the highest consideration and would need to be implemented if we are to have the balanced fleet which we would like to have, I agree with the statement in the address of Senator Olson that the recommendation for the creation of a maritime force by obtaining twice as many major weapons platforms is not realistic. Public opinion has to be taken into account in these matters, and to obtain that support, for example in announcing the frigate program, it was stressed that this would be of great benefit not only to the navy but to the shipbuilding industry and would create needed employment. In the report it is also mentioned that the building of the recommended force would produce important benefits to the economy. To my mind mentioning that the recommendations of the first two reports, if implemented, would see defence expenditures rise from about two per cent to 2.3 per cent of the gross national product means nothing to the average citizen; those to whom it does have meaning are probably already convinced of the need for such expenditure.

Honourable senators, the members of the subcommittee have performed a valuable service in their study of our maritime defence and they certainly deserve our thanks for a job well done. While it may appear that the recommendations in the report are not acceptable or, at least, not immediately acceptable, I think in general it is certainly fulfilling one of the purposes of the committee, which is set out in the final paragraph which I quote:

The sub-committee from its inception has seen its most effective potential contribution to be that of promoting informed, dispassionate discussion about defence—a subject some have termed the first responsibility of a state. It is the profound hope of all members that this, the subcommittee's second report, will aid in that objective. If in so doing the report also prompts needed action, the reward to its authors would be beyond measure.

Honourable senators, in my opinion the report has promoted and is promoting informed, dispassionate discussion on defence. And more than that, it is the basis of an informed public opinion which will lead to Canada obtaining a balanced, modern navy sooner than would otherwise have been the case.

I congratulate the subcommittee on its excellent work and on the high quality of the report and I look forward with great interest to the publication of the third report.

Thank you for your patience, honourable senators.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, with profound apologies I must state that I disagree with many of the conclusions found in the report and much of the philosophy that went into it. It gives me the feeling that it is talking about World War II. During that war I served in the British navy, the Senior Service, the best navy in the world, as we liked to tell the Americans, but the Royal Canadian Navy was as good.

What would one want such a modern navy for? Would we attack Soviet submarines coming into our waters before those submarines fired their missiles? If we did so, we would be launching World War III; if we did so, it would mean we had agreed with the Americans that we were going to strike first at the Russians, and I do not think that that is our intention.

I do not see much point in attacking the Russian submarines after they have launched their missiles, because we would be frying at the other end of their missiles' trajectories. It seems to me that a reasonable navy for Canada to have is one that can intercept smugglers, that can question foreign ships that enter our waters, but not one that is capable of fighting Soviet submarines or the Soviet fleet. If there is a NATO strategy to fight a naval war, or to escort convoys across the Atlantic, as in the good old days of World War II, it is a nostalgic strategy, I submit, which does not think in terms of the next war but of the last war; it is a strategy repeating what the French did with the Maginot Line. Therefore, with the greatest of respect, and humbly, because I am very new in this chamber, I find that the conclusions in the report have looked at the trees presented in each case by very able and dedicated military officers whom we pay to worry about a particular tree, but who have not looked at the total forest, which is a forest in which we will not fight. Our whole aim is to avoid a third world war. So far, I have not heard of a reasonable policy for avoiding a third world war other than convincing the Russians that if they fire first they will sustain our retaliatory fire. In other words, the U.S. retaliatory fire will destroy them. Senator Macdonald and the members of the committee propose that we go the British and French route and develop our own nuclear deterrent forces consisting of four or five submarines capable of destroying Russian cities. That is fine if we are fired upon first, but since we are not going that route, I do not see any point in following the suggestions of the committee.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had not thought of entering into this discussion until I heard Senator Gigantès make his observations regarding the report. I must admit that he raises points which I think deserve careful consideration and I really think that they may have received some consideration by the committee when it was preparing its report.

One of the assumptions that underline the work the committee did was that we were not planning to deal with nuclear war. If one makes the assumption that the Russians are going to fire nuclear weapons from submarines, and our navy might stop that, we are assuming that the situation will be one of nuclear conflict. If that is the case we can relax because there is not much anyone is going to be able to do about it anyway. As far as we can tell, the consequences of a nuclear interchange are so disastrous that there is left nothing to talk about.

The committee in its consideration of this matter concluded that it would not be useful to make any recommendations which contemplated military action in the event of a nuclear war. The chairman of the committee is sitting here and heard a lot more of the evidence than I did, and I would not be at all upset if he corrected me on any of these points. The committee stated that we are not dealing with a nuclear situation but what is now called, charmingly, a conventional war. Of course, it raises the whole question of just how tolerable a conventional war might be.

The first point I want to make is that if you are thinking of nuclear war, then there is no point in talking about a navy. Before the navy gets out of the harbour, that war will be over with the impact of nuclear weapons. I do not think the committee had that in mind. Senator Gigantès' criticism of that point is well taken if we were contemplating nuclear war, but I do not think we were. What we were contemplating was a conventional war. One can say that it is not going to be at all like World War II, and I think that is quite right. You cannot really expect history to repeat itself—certainly not military history. I agree with him that there is a great temptation to fight the last war in all our military plans, and it may be that the committee has slipped into that danger in some of its thinking, but I hope not.

What are we talking about then? I think we are talking about the whole question of deterrence. When you talk about whether or not you should do anything about the navy, you are talking about a deterrent to a conventional war. If you are manifestly not contemplating being prepared to fight a conventional war, then any way in which you might hope to discourage the other side from indulging in that kind of warfare will, of course, be fruitless. You will see that you are like Britain in 1939, unable, because they had done nothing about rearmament, to weigh into the balance of decision the intentions of Hitler at that time.

Canada, to my mind, should take its place in the NATO structure, however imperfect that may be—and, heaven knows, it is not entirely satisfactory—contemplating a conventional type of conflict, and be able to pull its weight. It is a matter of judgment as to whether or not that is a futile operation. You may say that conventional warfare is a ridiculous idea. How soon after the conventional war starts does the nuclear holocaust begin? That is certainly a credible scenario, and if it turns out to be the right one then there is no hope.

I merely wanted to say that when the committee was considering this matter it was considering the desirability or otherwise of having a deterrent capability in the face of conventional warfare. I think there was another consideration, namely, our place in the scheme of the NATO alliance. One of the things that has always distressed me is that when Canadian statesmen have toured the world in favour of peace, and Canadian statesmen have endeavoured to mobilize the NATO alliance for that purpose, as the Prime Minister has tried to do, they find themselves at somewhat of a disadvantage because people say, "It is all very well for you to talk about peace, but you are not pulling your weight in our efforts to put ourselves in a position of effectiveness in the event of a military situation." In order to have an effective voice in the councils of those who decide these matters, I think you have to be regarded as pulling your weight.

One of the concerns of the committee was that in the naval field the Government of Canada was not pulling its weight in NATO. You have to make up your mind whether that is a good or a bad thing. It seems to me that if it is a bad thing, then we ought to abandon the alliance. That, of course, means abandoning a great deal of any prospect that we have of sovereignty or independence in respect of other people who are on our side. If we do not pull our weight in NATO, and do not do our part with respect to conventional warfare, somebody else is going to have to do it for us. We might not approve of their doing it for us, but they are going to do it for us. If that happens, then I think our capacity to weigh in on the decisions in that field is somewhat limited.

While I do not pretend to speak on behalf of the committee or present an exhaustive analysis of the situation—I realize that this is hardly the time to do so in any case—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It's fine.

Senator Roblin: Well, if you don't have your bills at 3.30, you're out of luck.

When this matter was brought up at this stage, I gave my view as to what the committee was attempting to do. We should deal with this question of nuclear warfare as opposed to conventional warfare. We should deal with the question of our place in the alliance and what it means for Canadian sovereignty and independence and influence in the decision-making, and we should deal with the question of whether a deterrent in the event of conventional warfare is worth anything at all.

Those three propositions are wide open to debate. It is taxing some of the best minds in the western world to come up with the right answers. Perhaps the committee does not have the right answers. I am willing to make plenty of room for differences of opinion or to be convinced, indeed, that the general approach of the committee to these problems is open to question. I have to admit that, but as far as I am concerned the work of the committee had those three considerations in mind, and that should be taken into account in judging what the committee is recommending.

This whole question requires a wiser man than me to come up with the correct answer, but I think the committee has made an honest—and I know everyone agrees with this—and legitimate attempt to define the problem. That is the first thing to do—define the issue—and then consider how Canada should react to it. For what they are worth, I throw in these few thoughts this afternoon.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am grateful to those who participated in this debate this afternoon. It is a question that we have to keep at the forefront of our minds. What we also have to keep at the forefront of our thinking is alerting the population of Canada to our requirements and basic needs on defence. I completely agree with Senator Roblin's comments, particularly with respect to the political impact or the nature of the influence we may exert with our allies, if we are not true to ourselves or them in honouring the defence commitments that we have accepted.

I cannot completely disagree with Senator Gigantès, but he seems to concentrate on one scenario only—that of nuclear war or no war. I do not think it is as black or white as that. If we were to accept that the only scenario is nuclear war on both sides of the fence, then let us drop our defences completely. If we do that, then, of course, we avoid nuclear war because the other side does not need to use nuclear weapons to pursue their aims.

Aside from our commitments to the Alliance, global conflicts and so on, we have to take care to police our own backyard. We need some defences along our coast. We need to defend ourselves against minor encroachments. Such minor encroachments, as we say in our report, can from time to time come from our enemies as they can come from our friends.

It is a question of Canada having at hand a navy to defend its coast, its territories and its approaches. While this subject may not have been pinpointed in our report, a major item to my mind is our deploring the total absence of mine counter-measures in the make-up of our navy at the present time. We know that the potential enemy has a tremendous inventory of mines of a wide variety. The latest figures we were given were in the order of 350,000 to 400,000. We know that the enemy has the capacity to deploy those mines ad infinitum by a variety of ways through submarines, fishing vessels and aircraft. We know it takes very few of those mines to create panic in North America.

It would only take two dozen mines across the Juan de Fuca Strait; six across the front of Halifax harbour; twelve across the Cabot Strait; the Belle Isle Strait we probably cannot ignore;—

Senator Roblin: One would do there.

Senator Lafond:—two or three in front of Sydney Harbour; half a dozen in front of St. John's Harbour; and a dozen across the Bay of Fundy—which could be done in 20 hours—to completely block our sea lanes and our workable harbours. No matter what else we need to do, we need to ship materials, men and food abroad should the conflict develop. Yet, our harbours can be completely blocked within a matter of hours.

As we say in our report, at the moment our only means of hunting, discovering and destroying mines is by hand-held equipment used by some of our naval divers. That, to my mind, comes awfully close to criminal negligence.

On that item alone, I still believe the report was of value to the people of Canada. I hope that starting next week, whichever government is to be responsible for our destinies over the next four years, it will pay close attention to the considerations which we ourselves have given to this question.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I feel somewhat embarrassed in disagreeing with such distinguished honourable senators, such kind people who have shown me great friendliness and patience in allowing me to attend meetings of the National Defence Committee of which I was not a member. However, I do wish to pose some questions to Senators Lafond and Roblin on this subject. At this time, the potential enemy, the Soviet Bloc, does have considerable superiority over us in terms of conventional weapons. Would Senator Lafond agree that if the Soviet Bloc does not use its weaponry, it is not using it because of the U.S. nuclear deterrent?

Senator Roblin said that in order to have an effective voice, we must pull our weight. Using that same logic, that means we should have a nuclear deterrent ourselves; is that what he means? I should also like to ask Senator Roblin: Does he extend his thinking that if we do not do it ourselves, someone else will do it to the point of saying that we must not let the Americans perform the defence tasks they perform on behalf of Canada, and perform them all ourselves?

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, at no time would I assume that I know what the potential enemy thinks or that I know what the potential enemy will do in one instance or another. I can only recommend that we keep our guard up and be ready to react to whatever he decides to do at any given time.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think it would be courteous to try to answer the two questions put to me by Senator Gigantès.

These questions involve matters of definition. When you talk about pulling your weight, you are speaking in terms that have to be defined, and I agree with that. I think Senator Gigantès is dealing with that point.

Canada, unlike our three major allies—the United States, Great Britain and France—long ago decided it would not have a nuclear capability. Therefore, I think that pulling our weight has to do with the conventional effort. No one expects us to pull our weight in the nuclear field. Our decision has been a matter of policy. It was decided long ago that that would not be our role. We have accepted responsibility in the field of conventional warfare and that is the area in which I think we should pull our weight.

Honourable senators, I have to admit that the United States defends the whole of western society by virtue of its control of the nuclear weapon deterrent. Given that the United States is the country that wields that particular weapon or, indeed, is the body which is really orchestrating the policy of deterrence, then that is their field of operation. I would expect that no Canadian would think that our sovereignty is infringed on that account.

In the area of conventional weapons, there is a suggestion that we should have a more acceptable posture. It seems to me that we do not do this entirely in isolation from our allies. We have always done this in co-operation with our allies, particularly with respect to the United States, NORAD being the principal example. I expect we always will. That is what an alliance is all about.

There is a substantial area in which we conduct joint operations. Where we do not have the paramount input, it is obvious that we are not going to have the paramount word.

There is a world of difference between that situation and doing nothing at all to the extent that we are being defended by someone else without bearing any of the costs involved. That is a position which I think would be dangerous for anyone who has any regard for our sovereignty and our national posture.

Honourable senators, we are not a warlike people. We are not militarists. We do not want to have vast armaments. We want to keep them to as low a degree as we possibly can, and it is a matter of judgment as to where we go. We are simply saying in this committee that we think the country has neglected this responsibility to a considerable extent in the past. I think that we are suggesting, in military terms, at least, a rather modest change in our position. It will not be modest in terms of money—heaven knows that is true. It will cost a lot of money, and we do not readily see at the moment when we will be able to fit that into our budgetary situation. I declare that to be the case, but it does not mean that we should not consider these matters thoughtfully and try to find that balance of judgment as to what we ought to do and where we ought to stand. That is the sort of thing the committee is trying to approach.

At the same time, I repeat what I said before: I am quite certain that we do not have the best answer. I hope it is a better answer than we have had so far. I welcome the intervention of those who would like to ask us to think again or to widen the scope of our consideration of these matters, because I do not think we have any pride of authorship. We are quite willing to be braced with any form of discussion, criticism or suggestion that members of this chamber or, indeed, the general public might wish to offer.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate, this order is considered to have been debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few moments ago I had word that the debate in the other place on Bill C-47 was going to continue until at least 4 o'clock. It was my intention to ask the Senate to adjourn until approximately 3.55 so that notice of Royal Assent could be given.

Within the last 45 seconds, however, I have been informed that Bill C-47 has been passed in the House of Commons. I still do not know whether it is the intention in the other place to pass any more bills. As I understand the rules, however, private members' hour begins in the house at 4 o'clock. It is now 3.45. I would therefore move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure for a maximum of 10 minutes, after which we will reassemble at the call of the bell.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-47, to amend the Indian Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT
BILL, 1984

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-58, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be now read the second time.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I will take just a few moments of your time to give an explanation of this bill. It will be recalled that a few weeks ago, on June 7, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs presented a report on proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, and so on, in various Statutes of Canada. At that time the committee made a number of suggestions. The rather extensive document was studied in committee for several days, and two members of the committee, namely Senators Tremblay and Lewis, formed a subcommittee to study each of the proposals in detail.

The document was considered over the course of three hearings, and in the committee's report it was suggested that certain amendments should be made. It was suggested that one section, which it was considered did not come within the non-controversial area, should be deleted entirely. A complete folio of our hearings, together with our report, was sent to the chairman of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place, which was also charged with studying the proposals.

It is my understanding that the committee of the other place studied our comments closely and the replies we had received from various government departments. As a result, it adopted all of the suggestions we had made in our report.

In addition, that committee made a couple of brief amendments, as follows: The first amendment was to clause 1 amending the short title of the act to read the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1984. As a consequence, all of the other paragraphs had to be renumbered.

The committee of the other place also recommended that one paragraph of those sections dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code should be deleted entirely. It concerned a revised version of the French text with respect to the definition of high treason. Apparently when that section was being considered by the committee, Mr. Bertrand, Chief Legislative Counsel, advised that there appeared to be a discrepancy between the present version in Martin's Criminal Code and an earlier version of the definition of high treason in both official languages. In view of the need to examine and correct the version in both languages, it was decided to drop that section entirely, and it has been omitted from this bill. The section that appears in the Criminal Code at present will remain until officials of the Department of Justice have had a further opportunity to study it.

The committee of the other place also recommended that there should be a clearer definition of the time that the publication of statutes could be made, namely at the end of a session rather than just at the end of a calendar year. That amendment has been incorporated in the bill.

There was also a minor amendment to the Old Age Security Act. Recently the Senate passed Bill C-40, which received Royal Assent. This amendment was incorporated into that act, and therefore the amendment contained in the present bill was redundant and was deleted.

Those are the only minor differences between the proposals which our committee studied and the bill now before you. I have reviewed the bill with Senator Nurgitz, the deputy chairman of the committee, and we agree that there is no necessity to send it to committee. I believe the honourable senator would concur in the passage of this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for a number of years, it has been customary to introduce this type of bill in the Senate. The purpose of such bills is to remove anomalies, archaisms and errors in the statutes; they also introduce other minor and non-debatable amendments. The general principle is that the amendment must be minor, not of any crucial importance and non-controversial. Upon the first objection, the amendments must be withdrawn from the bill.

As explained by Senator Neiman, the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs examined all the proposals and filed a report. The bill now before us is based on this report and takes into account the comments made in the House of Commons. Even today, if there were any objection, because of the very nature of this bill and of the agreement which preceeded its introduction, the amendment concerned would have to be withdrawn from the bill.

I did not have the opportunity to follow the work of the committee. Many senators on this side, including Senators Tremblay and Nurgitz, attended the committee meetings. Senator Nurgitz pointed out to me, and I draw the attention of the Senate to this fact, that in some cases, the changes may be substantial even if they are not debatable. Often, the difference between an anomaly, a mistake, an archaism or a change in substance is rather difficult to determine.

Senator Nurgitz suggested that there be two types of bill. One which deals with mistakes, anomalies, archaisms, and so on, but which does not deal with the substance and which is therefore non-debatable. He suggested that we have another type of bill to bring about small changes of substance which would also be non-debatable. There would therefore be no discrepancy between the title and the contents of these bills.

I did not attend the committee meetings. I do not recall which particular point Senator Nurgitz was talking about. I think he wanted to extend the definition of "bank" to a caisse populaire and a credit union. This is obviously a substantial change, but perhaps it is not debatable.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is substantial.

Senator Flynn: Every department tries to make its own small improvement; it is quite normal to try to do that with this kind of bill. Let us not make a fuss about it. Senator Nurgitz had a good idea; in the future, we ought to have two kinds of bills. We could have a bill such as the one mentioned here, and another which might deal with substantial changes which do not raise a controversy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved: That the bill be now read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[Senator Flynn.]
